Presumption of validity. The presumption in favor of the validity of a judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction, considered in the C.J.S. title Judgments §§ 425–427, also 34 C.J. p 537 note 72–p 554 note 52, exists in the case of judgments against infants equally as with judgments against adults,[34] where the parties are properly within the jurisdiction of the court.[35] Thus it will be presumed in aid of a judgment against an infant that the court had jurisdiction over the person of the infant,[36] as well as the subject matter, when the validity of the judgment is questioned collaterally,[37] and that the court[38] or the guardian ad litem[39] protected his interests. However, the presumption may be overcome by proof.[40] It has been held, although there is also authority to the contrary,[41] that jurisdiction of a minor defendant will not be presumed because the judgment shows the appointment of a guardian ad litem.[42]

b. Judgment by Default

As a general rule a default judgment or decree against an infant is erroneous, but although there is some authority which holds it void the preponderant view is that it is merely voidable and not void.

Although in some jurisdictions a default judgment against a minor within the jurisdiction of the court and properly represented is not invalid,[43] and may properly be entered,[44] as a general rule, in some jurisdictions under statutes so providing, a judgment should not be rendered against an infant by default and without proof of the facts relied on for relief.[45] Such a judgment is erroneous,[46] and on appropriate proceedings may be vacated or set aside;[47] but although there is some authority to the effect that such a judgment is void[48] the preponderance of authority supports the view that it is merely voidable,[49] and not absolutely void.[50] However, in some jurisdictions the time and manner of entry of judgment by default against an infant are regulated by statute, in which case the statute must be complied with in order to render the judgment binding on the infant.[51]

The fact that a defendant proceeded against as an adult was an infant some months prior to the institution of the suit involved will not prevent the court from deeming him sui juris and, on his fail-

c. Consent Judgment

In general, in the absence of fraud or collusion, a consent decree or judgment may bind an infant party, provided the court has investigated the facts and determined its fairness to the infant.

As a general rule, in the absence of fraud or collusion,[53] an infant may be bound by a consent judgment or decree in an action or suit to which he is a party,[54] at least where the judgment or decree is based on an adjudication of the court, after investigation of the facts, that it is fit and proper,[55] and, in some jurisdictions, even though it was pronounced without any inquiry and determination as to whether or not it was for the infant's benefit.[56] However, before entering a consent decree the court should inquire whether or not the terms of it are for the interest of the infant;[57] and in the majority of jurisdictions an infant is not bound by a judgment or decree rendered by consent without evidence,[58]

Court not bound by representative's consent

The answer of guardian ad litem of minor admitting allegations of complaint and consenting that decree be entered as prayed does not require entry of consent decree, since court is not bound by admission of guardian ad litem, even though decree would be binding on infant.—Schramm v. U. S. Nat. Bank of Portland, 52 P.2d 181, 151 Or. 693.

Inquiry by court customary

Ordinarily, court will not enter consent decree where infants are concerned without inquiry as to whether or not decree is for their benefit.—Schramm v. U. S. Nat. Bank of Portland, supra.

Inquiry not dispensed with because of counsel

(1) A full investigation of all the conditions and circumstances should be made, even though the infant is represented by counsel.—Dearing v. Speedway Realty Co., 40 N.E.2d 414, 111 Ind.App. 585.

(2) Where settlement of infant's suit by next friend is proposed, court has duty to protect infant's interest by judicially ascertaining facts, through real hearing and consideration of them, even though infant is represented by his own counsel who, in good faith and to the best of his ability, is safeguarding the infant's interests.—Gilliland v. Bondurant, 59 S.W.2d 679, 332 Mo. 881, affirming, App., 51 S.W.2d 559.

Inquiry as to agreement unnecessary where evidence considered

Where judgment foreclosing minor's interest was rendered on evidence, it was held that there was no necessity that attorneys' agreement for judgment be passed on by court.—Stillwell v. Standard Savings & Loan Ass'n, Tex.Civ.App., 30 S.W.2d 690, error dismissed.

Extent of investigation required

(1) The court must be sufficiently advised to enable it to arrive at a reasonable conclusion in the premises. This does not require the court to exhaust the minutest details which might arise in the course of a contested lawsuit, but it does require a fair hearing.—Perry v. Umberger, 65 P.2d 280, 145 Kan. 367.

(2) The court should not rely solely on statement of infant's parents or next friend or on statement of infant's counsel, but should hear such testimony or ascertain such facts as will fully convince court that judgment pursuant to such settlement will fully protect infant's rights and interest.—Dearing v. Speedway Realty Co., 40 N.E.2d 414, 111 Ind.App. 585.

(3) Statute requiring as condition of approval of settlement that the court find the effect on the estate of the minor is just and reasonable does not require that testimony be taken in a proceeding for settlement where the court is already acquainted with the material facts, as the finding necessary is one of substance, not of form, and is to be based on acquaintance with the situation rather than on whether or not witnesses are sworn.—In re Marxhausen's Estate, 225 N.W. 632, 247 Mich. 192.

58. N.C.—Keller v. Caldwell Furniture Co., 154 S.E. 674, 199 N.C. 413.
31 C.J. p 1168 note 79.

Effect of recital in judgment

Fact that judgment recited that evidence was heard was immaterial in view of express terms of judgment showing that it was based on stipulation and agreement which the circuit court was without jurisdiction to approve.—Campbell v. Campbell, 165 S.W.2d 851, 350 Mo. 169.

Record held to show evidence taken

or investigation and determination by the court of its fairness to the minor,[59] especially where it is prejudicial to him.[60] Such a judgment is not necessarily absolutely void,[61] although it may be erroneous.[62] Thus a court may set aside a consent judgment following a compromise of a minor's claim where there has been no real examination of the facts to determine whether or not the settlement is for the best interests of the minor,[63] even though fraud was not in fact committed,[64] and should do so where it appears that the consent decree was entered conformably to, and solely in reliance on, the stipulation.[65] If, however, the compromise was considered and sanctioned by the court[66] and was rendered on testimony in addition to the admission or confession of the guardian ad litem,[67] the judgment will not afterward be set aside where there was no fraud in its procurement; but, where the judgment was obtained through fraud, the rights of the infant parties are not bound thereby,[68] and the judgment may be set aside at the instance of the minor;[69] and the failure of the minor's representative to appeal from a consent judgment obtained through fraud, collusion, or neglect will not bind him so as to prevent a subsequently appointed representative from taking steps to have the judgment vacated.[70]

It will be presumed in the absence of any showing to the contrary that the court has performed its duty to inquire into the facts and determine whether or not the decree is for the best interests of the infant,[71] although it is not necessary that there be a reference to a master and a report by him,[72] but, if the judgment affirmatively shows that no investigation and determination of the fairness of the agreement to the infant were made, it is void;[73] and it has been held that a consent decree which waives or surrenders substantial rights of the minor is not binding because it denotes a surrender of the rights of the infant without investigation by the court.[74]

If the judgment by consent is beneficial to the infant's interests, it will not be set aside.[75]

A judgment which shows that it was not agreed to, but instead that the cause was submitted to the court by agreement of the parties, is binding on an infant party.[76]

In action for possession of realty, where infant was not made party, judgment against infant was held void, although infant's guardian ad litem filed answer, where infant's interests were not presented to court in good faith and passed on by court. —Wyatt v. Berry, 170 S.E. 131, 205 N.C. 118.

Adverse party cannot preclude infant's rights

Defendant who before consenting to judgment in action for injuries knew that minor's rights were not properly laid before the court, and participated in attempt to adjudicate minor's rights could not preclude minor from seeking to set aside such judgment in so far as it failed to compensate minor for his injuries.—Missouri-Kansas-Texas R. consent judgment taken by consent of a next friend whose interests were antagonistic to those of the infant is void.[77] Also an agreed judgment will not be sustained on direct attack where the infant had no counsel in fact and the same attorneys represented both sides which were adverse.[78]

Unauthorized agreement. A consent judgment agreed to by an attorney who had no authority from the next friend to compromise the rights of the minor is void.[79] A consent judgment agreed to by an attorney in a suit filed through the medium of a next friend for a person over twenty-one years of age, which suit was not authorized by plaintiff, is void.[80]

Judgment outside the issues. A consent judgment purporting to adjudicate matters not within the issues of the cause in which it is entered is not binding on an infant party thereto.[81]

d. Confession of Judgment

In general a judgment or decree cannot be entered pro confesso against an infant.

A bill cannot be taken as confessed or judgment by confession entered against an infant,[82] and the error of entering a judgment as confessed against an infant is not cured by a reservation to him of the right to show cause against the judgment after he becomes of age.[83] However, a judgment confessed on a bond after an infant's majority pursuant to a warrant executed shortly before the infant's majority cannot be repudiated for the first time after a lapse of ten years.[84]

e. Decree for Conveyance of Land

The authorities are not in accord as to the validity of a decree to compel a minor to convey realty.

In some jurisdictions it has been held that, in a proper case, a decree may be entered against an infant compelling him to make a conveyance.[85] In other jurisdictions it has been held that such a decree cannot be entered so as to compel him to do so during infancy;[86] and under some statutes a court cannot remove the disabilities of minors under a specified age so as to enable them to convey an interest in land, and a judgment or decree so doing is void.[87]

a. In General

In general an infant may obtain relief during or after his minority against an erroneous judgment, but unless it is void he has no absolute right to have it avoided, a request therefor being addressed to the sound discretion of the court and granted only when it is for the best interests of the infant so to do.

In general a judgment in a proceeding to which a minor is a party which is voidable on grounds arising out of his minority may be avoided by him on attaining his majority.[88] However, an infant ordinarily has no absolute right to avoid a judgment or decree against him[89] unless it is void.[90] It is not within the power of the infant to avoid the judgment by a mere election because of incapacity arising from his infancy.[91] A proceeding to avoid such a judgment or decree,[92] including a default judgment or decree,[93] is addressed to the sound discretion of the court, which discretionary authority is legal and not arbitrary in character;[94] and while it should be liberally exercised to protect the infant's interests,[95] the court will not set aside the judgment or decree unless for the best interest of the minor,[96] and relief will not be granted if his rights were fully safeguarded and he suffered no substantial injury.[97] The correction of a decree involving minors and adults in a case in which all were properly served with process, is not void because rendered without service of notice of the filing of the petition for correction on the minors where the court investigated and made a finding that the correction was proper and not prejudicial to the minors.[98] In the absence of fraud or collusion, a decree rendered in an infant's favor on a bill by next friend, whether involving real or personal estate, cannot be reopened by the infant.[99]

The right to maintain an action to review a judgment against infant defendants after their arrival at majority exists only in those who were infants at the time of the rendition of the judgment, and interested in it, and does not belong to such as thereafter became interested in the subject matter of the suit by reason of the death of one of the parties to it.[1]

A judgment creditor has the duty to have canceled and erased from the records the inscription of a judgment against a minor which should never have been rendered.[2]

A decree against minors which is erroneous because of matters arising out of their minority will not be reformed at the request of adult plaintiffs.[3] However, a voidable judgment against a minor is of such precarious value to plaintiff that it may be vacated on his motion under a statute authorizing the court to vacate a final judgment on motion of the prevailing party if execution has not been satisfied in whole or in part.[4]

b. Time for Application

In many jurisdictions the statutes so provide, and it is held in conformity therewith, that an infant has a specified fixed time after majority in which to attack a judgment or decree in a proceeding to which he is a party, which right may be exercised at any time within the period fixed, but not thereafter. The right to attack a judgment or decree may be lost by laches.

It has been held independent of statute that a judgment irregularly obtained against an infant may be set aside after he has become of age,[5] and at one time, as considered infra subdivision c of this section, it was the practice for a decree in equity against an infant to be entered nisi and to contain a provision giving him a day in court after he became of age to show cause against it before it became absolute. Now, however, by force of statutes enacted in the various jurisdictions an infant generally has a fixed time after arrival at majority in which to show cause against or seek to vacate or set aside a judgment or decree rendered in a proceeding to which he is a party;[6] and a general statute prescribing the time within which proceedings to set aside judgments or decrees of a court shall be instituted does not bar an infant from maintaining such a suit where another statute provides that infants shall have the same time after their disability has been removed to bring an action as is prescribed for other persons.[7] Also, where there is no statute specifically prescribing the time within which a suit to annul a decree must be brought, it has been held that the court by analogy will limit the time therefor to the time prescribed by the statutes for bills of review, appeals, and similar proceedings.[8] Under such statutes the court has power to grant relief at or after the term at which the judgment or decree complained of was entered;[9] and independent of statute the court may grant relief during the term at which the judgment or decree was rendered.[10] The infant, by appropriate proceedings, may attack the judgment or decree at any time within the period fixed by statute,[11] and it is unnecessary that such right be reserved in the judgment or order.[12] He is not bound to move at the earliest possible opportunity to set aside the judgment or decree,[13] and need not do so during infancy;[14] nor is he required to wait until after he comes of age before seeking relief, but may apply for that purpose as soon as he sees fit.[15] However, proceedings attacking a judgment or decree not void on its face must be commenced within the statutory time provided therefor or the right to do so will be lost;[16] and where the decree is valid on its face and has become absolute by the running of time, the court is without authority to vacate or

Supervening disability not tacked

An infant remainderman who was party to decree of October 2, 1893, foreclosing mortgage on remainder and who reached his majority on August 16, 1903, was barred by lapse of time from directly or collaterally attacking decree in proceeding instituted on March 17, 1938, notwithstanding that remainderman was adjudged of unsound mind on May 23, 1901, and was not adjudicated of sound mind until within two years of March 17, 1938, and that life estate did not end until August 8, 1934. —McCampbell v. Warrich Corporation, C.C.A.Ill., 109 F.2d 115, certiorari denied 60 S.Ct. 1077, 310 U.S. 631, 84 L.Ed. 1401, rehearing denied 61 S.Ct. 55, second case, 311 U.S. 612, 85 L.Ed. 388, and 61 S.Ct. 1089, 313 U.S. 599, 85 L.Ed. 1551.

set it aside.[17] This limitation does not apply where the judgment is absolutely void, as in such case lapse of time does not give it validity;[18] and in some jurisdictions statutes limiting the time within which an infant may bring suit to set aside a judgment to a specified time after he reaches majority do not apply where the fact of his minority does not appear in the record of the original action.[19] Also, although it is held in some jurisdictions that a statutory limitation on the time within which an infant may attack a judgment or decree applies even though fraud was practiced in obtaining it,[20] in others it is held that a judgment or decree may be vacated or set aside at any time where it affirmatively appears that it was obtained through actual or constructive fraud.[21] However, where the fraud involved was a concealed fraud it has been held that an independent action for relief on the ground that the judgment was fraudulently obtained may be brought within the period allowed by statute after the discovery of the fraud to enjoin the enforcement of adverse rights fraudulently obtained and is not limited to the time allowed by statute to reverse, vacate, or modify a judgment in the court in which it was rendered.[22]

Right restricted as under former equity practice. Statutes giving a minor the right to attack a judgment or decree within a fixed time after majority have been held designed to afford an infant such equitable relief as he would have been entitled to under the former equity practice,[23] and not to extend or amplify the right to relief beyond those cases in which, under the old practice, such right was reserved in the decree.[24] Hence, since under the former practice it was proper to reserve in the decree a right to show cause against it after majority only in the case of infant defendants, as considered infra subdivision c of this section, they have, in some jurisdictions, been held not applicable to a judgment or decree in an action in which the complaining infant was the actor.[25]

Laches. A party may lose his right to attack a judgment rendered during his minority by laches,[26] as where he fails to assert his right for several years after reaching majority,[27] especially where the rights of innocent third persons have intervened.[28] Also, where a minor becomes of age during the pendency of proceedings to which he is a party, his failure to disaffirm promptly after attaining his majority constitutes laches which will bar him from questioning the judgment subsequently rendered on grounds arising out of his minority.[29] Laches and unreasonable delay in challenging a default judgment rendered against defendant in

Cases involving affirmative and non-affirmative action

It has been held that although there are early cases decided in other jurisdictions in which a distinction was made between cases in which the infant was directed to make or join in a conveyance and cases in which the title was divested by the decree itself without affirmative act on the part of the infant that the common-law rule is unsettled and the statute should be given universal application and construed to permit infants to show cause within twelve months after arriving at full age in all cases of judgments against them. —Bennett v. Majority attained after trial

Minor defendant who, raising no question regarding minority, participated in trial without guardian, was held not entitled to vacation of adverse judgment where minor attained majority after trial and before judgment, and her attorneys, after she a proceeding commenced after he attained his majority will cause the court to refuse to strike it on the ground that he has a meritorious defense in that he was a minor at the time the liability was entered into.[30]

c. Infant's Day in Court

Prior to the enactment of statutes enabling an infant to attack a judgment or decree within a fixed period after his arrival at majority, it was the practice in equity that a decree against an infant defendant should be entered nisi and a reservation made therein giving him the right to show cause against it after he became of age before it became absolute, but such a reservation was not made in favor of an infant plaintiff.

It has been the practice in equity that a decree against an infant shall first be entered nisi and shall contain a provision giving him a day in court after he became of age to show cause against it before it becomes absolute;[31] and when the decree contains such a provision the infant is entitled, as a matter of course, at any time before the decree is made absolute to put in a new answer and have the cause heard again.[32] In many jurisdictions, however, the necessity for such a reservation has been obviated by statutes giving the infant time to show cause after majority, considered supra subdivision b of this section.

Necessity of reservation of day in decree. In general, where an infant defendant is entitled to his day in court, after majority, to show cause, the right must be expressly reserved to him in the decree, or the decree will be erroneous,[33] and may be impeached by appropriate proceedings for that purpose;[34] but the decree will not be considered absolutely void, and therefore it is not subject to collateral attack.[35] Under some statutes an infant is entitled to his day in court, whether the right is expressly reserved to him or not; and in such cases, therefore, the failure to reserve the right is not even error.[36] The clause reserving to an infant defendant the right to show cause against a decree after majority should not, of course, be inserted in a decree, in cases where the infant is not entitled to that right under any circumstances.[37]

Infant complainants. As a general rule, infant complainants are bound by the judgment or decree entered in the cause, and, in the absence of statute authorizing them to attack it after arrival at majority, considered supra subdivision b of this section, are not entitled to a day after coming of age to show cause against it.[38]

d. Grounds

The judgment or decree rendered during minority may be vacated on the grounds which are open to an adult, and also for irregularities in the proceedings arising out of minority. To obtain relief substantial harm must have been caused to the minor's rights, but a showing of injustice has been held sufficient to entitle him to relief.

It has been stated that the grounds on which one may avoid a judgment or decree rendered during his minority are the same as those of an adult,[39] and only those.[40] Such statement, of course, must be considered as qualified by the differences in the time in which the grounds for relief may be available because of the extended period during which an infant may seek relief, as considered supra subdivision b of this section; and perhaps it should be limited, as far as it indicates a restriction of the grounds to those available to adults, to grounds go-attained majority and before decision of cause, presented additional points and authorities to court, which did not include any item relating to defendant's minority.—Carver v. Donin, 33 P.2d 841, 139 Cal.App. 395.

ing to the merits of the cause of action, for certain irregularities in the proceedings in which the judgment or decree was rendered, which arise out of the party's infancy and are nonexistent where persons sui juris are involved, have at varying times been held sufficient grounds on which to obtain relief, as, for example, the want, or improper representation, of the minor,[41] or that his interests were not properly protected,[42] as that the action, where judgment was rendered against the infant, was not defended,[43] or that a consent judgment or decree was entered without previous judicial sanction or proper investigation.[44] However, a judgment or decree cannot be avoided merely on the ground of infancy,[45] and, although it has been held that a minor is entitled to have a default judgment opened on a petition alleging that he was a minor,[46] it has also been held in such case that the judgment will not be stricken off where no irregularity appears on the face of the record.[47] The judgment or decree may be impeached or set aside for fraud,[48] collusion,[49] or neglect;[50] and there is authority which indicates that these are the only grounds available where the infant is properly represented in the proceeding.[51] However, it has also been held that the judgment or decree may be avoided for surprise,[52] mistake,[53] error[54] apparent on the face

Foreclosure of void mortgage
Judgment foreclosing mortgage of minor's realty made by guardian without county court's authority, and proceedings thereunder, may be set aside in a proper proceeding brought by infant.—Fowler v. Humphrey Inv. Co., 286 P. 867, 142 Okl. 221.
Error in infant's name insufficient ground
Where judgment expressly excepted minor defendant's interest in land against foreclosure of vendor's and trust deed liens, although minor's name was incorrectly given in judgment and undisputed evidence showed person named in judgment was same person as minor who was cited and for whom guardian ad litem was appointed, judgment would not be set aside on ground that minor was being deprived of property under false name by being improperly cit-

of the proceedings,[55] unavoidable casualty or misfortune preventing the party from prosecuting or defending,[56] want of jurisdiction in the court[57] or of the person,[58] or other grounds which will vacate a judgment affecting an adult.[59]

In general the error for which a judgment or decree may be avoided must be such that, if appealed, it would cause a reversal,[60] or show that other facts have been discovered which show the decree to be wrong.[61] The nature of the proceeding by which relief is sought may determine whether the error relied on must be one of law or of fact. If relief is sought by writ of error coram nobis,[62] or by motion in the nature of a writ of error coram nobis,[63] conformably to the rules applicable to judgments generally, considered in the C.J.S. title Judgments § 312, also 34 C.J. p 393 note 1–p 398 note 49, the error, in order to constitute a ground for relief, must be an error of fact and not of law; and the facts relied on must be facts which do not appear on the record, were unknown to the court, and, if known, would have precluded the rendition of the judgment.[64] On the other hand, a proceeding to vacate or set aside the judgment or decree by bill of review cannot be sustained because of error of fact;[65] and it has been held, on motion to vacate or other procedure instituted under statutes giving infants the right to show cause after majority against a judgment or decree for errors therein, that errors of law constitute grounds for relief,[66] but errors of fact do not.[67] It has been held, however, that, where the infants were properly represented and their rights fully litigated and considered, the mere fact that the court erred in its decision will not enable the infants to reopen the question after the time to review the decision has passed;[68] and also that mere error in the judgment rendered will not authorize the court to set aside the judgment at a succeeding term of court on the petition of the minor's guardian.[69] A mistake of law by one of the parties is no ground for vacating a consent decree.[70]

On collateral attack the only fraud which constitutes ground for relief is fraud which shows a lack of jurisdiction.[71]

A judgment or decree will not be set aside on merely technical grounds,[72] as, for example, for mere irregularity of form.[73]

Injustice or improvidence. The fact that applicant was an infant when the judgment was rendered and that the judgment itself is shown to be unjust is sufficient to entitle applicant to relief.[74]

Injustice and improvidence not shown

Tex.—Griggs v. Brewster, Civ.App., 16 S.W.2d 839, denying rehearing

A judgment entered on agreement of the parties may be set aside because it is improvident as to an infant party,[75] as where a confessed judgment in favor of a minor, made by the court without a proper investigation of the facts, did not adequately compensate him for the injuries sustained,[76] and a judgment adverse to an infant may be set aside because his interests were not properly cared for;[77] but mere inadequacy of relief due to a failure of the court to realize the extent of the injuries suffered after a proper investigation of the facts will not warrant the vacation of a consent judgment.[78] However, the reasonableness of the amount for which a default judgment against an infant defendant was rendered should not be considered in the determination of whether or not it should be set aside for failure to appoint a guardian ad litem.[79]

Necessity of prejudice. While a judgment against an infant may be set aside for irregularity,[80] it is generally held that the error must be such as affects the substantial rights of the infant,[81] especially where the rights of innocent third persons have intervened.[82] Hence, the infant must show a valid defense to the action in which the judgment or decree was rendered.[83]

Newly discovered evidence. A decree against infants will not be set aside for newly discovered evidence, merely because the guardian ad litem failed to produce in evidence facts which were then patent, although, if the guardian colluded with plaintiff to suppress facts, or was so grossly negligent that his failure to produce the evidence amounted to a fraud, the relief will be granted.[84]

Grounds existing at rendition of decree. The right of an infant to show cause against a decree which affects his interests is limited to cause existing at the time of the rendition of the decree, and not such as arose afterward.[85]

e. Defenses and Conditions Precedent

An infant may be estopped, or may waive the right, to attack a judgment or decree affecting his interests, as by a prior unsuccessful attack thereon. The necessity for the error relied on depends under varying circumstances on the procedure by which relief is sought. Ordinarily it is not necessary to tender or return the consideration received or paid under the judgment or decree attacked.

An infant may become estopped to attack a judgment against him or affecting his interests,[86] and, where defects or defenses are waived by a failure to prosecute timely and appropriate review proceedings, the judgment cannot thereafter be attacked on such grounds in equitable proceedings.[87]

Where, on an infant's showing cause against a decree against him, an additional fact appears, which if it had been originally shown would have authorized the decree, it will not be disturbed, although without that fact being proved the decree ought not to have been entered.[88]

Where an attempt by an infant, after his arrival at majority, to set aside a decree, is founded in fraud, the relief asked will not be granted.[89] In order for an infant to have a judgment set aside for fraud of the adverse party it has been held that he must show that he or his representative exercised due diligence at the former trial to relieve himself of the effects of such fraud.[90]

Mere acquiescence by an infant while under disability in a default judgment is insufficient to justify the denial of his motion to set it aside.[91]

The failure of an infant who attained his majority a short time before final determination of the case in the appellate court to appear therein will not affect his right later to contest issues incidentally involved in the proceeding.[92]

Prior unsuccessful attack. Where an unsuccessful effort to attack a judgment against an infant has been made by a suit by his guardian during his minority,[93] or by a petition to vacate the judgment filed by the minor after attaining his majority,[94] he is thereafter precluded from attacking it; and, where an infant against whom judgment had been rendered after coming of age joined with the other defendants in a motion for a new trial and appealed from an order denying such motion, which was affirmed, it was held that by joining in the motion and appeal he submitted himself to the jurisdiction of the court and could not thereafter move to set aside the judgment on the ground of his infancy.[95] An unsuccessful action by a party seeking relief against a judgment under a statute authorizing relief from a judgment taken through mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect does not bar the right of an infant defendant who was made a party to the statutory proceeding to have the judgment reviewed for error within the statutory time allowed therefor, where error of law committed on the trial is not cause for relief under the statutory proceeding.[96]

Appearance of error in record. Under statutes authorizing an infant to show cause against a judgment within a fixed time after arrival at majority it has been held not necessary, if his condition of infancy appears in the record, for the error to appear therein in order for the court to vacate the judgment.[97] Under some statutes in order for a judgment to be vacated or modified after term because the infant was not properly represented in the case, the condition of infancy must not appear in the record, nor the error in the proceedings.[98]

Tender or return of funds or property received under judgment. It has been held that parties who accept and, after reaching majority, retain benefits received under a judgment rendered during their minority cannot, while still retaining such benefits, repudiate the judgment.[99] On the other hand it has been held that a minor is not required to tender or pay back any consideration received by, or paid to, him in satisfaction of the judgment or decree as a prerequisite to maintaining a proceeding to have it vacated or set aside,[1] unless it is shown that he has actually received and still possesses it,[2] or that it was spent for necessaries.[3] A return will not be required where the money was paid to the guardian ad litem or next friend and not to the minor and there is no showing that the latter had the consideration at the time he instituted proceedings to vacate the judgment.[4] Also, if no money was paid to, or received by, the guardian, it is unnecessary that a payment of the fee of the original attorney for the minor out of the amount due on the judgment in the minor's favor be refunded as a prerequisite to the reopening of the judgment on petition by the minor's next friend.[5] Where some of the persons interested in a partition proceeding were represented by guardians, but it was not shown that the money received by them or by their guardians was received with knowledge of the fact that any portion of it was the proceeds of the property of partition, the proceedings and decree for partition did not prevent the infants from electing, on attaining their majority, to follow the property itself.[6]

The acceptance of funds under a consent judgment will not estop minors from suing to have the judgment set aside where such funds constitute only a portion of the funds to which they were actually entitled;[7] and, where a vacation of only a part of the judgment is sought, the failure to return or tender money received under the portion of the judgment not attacked will not preclude the granting of relief.[8] Ordinarily an averment of a willingness to repay and a request for an accounting is a sufficient tender of the amount received.[9]

f. Relief as against Bona Fide Purchasers

In general the rights of bona fide purchasers under a judgment or decree rendered in proceedings to which an infant was a party are not affected by its vacation; but the rights of those who are not bona fide purchasers are not protected.

A decree or judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction in a proceeding to which an infant is a party is so far binding that it will not be set aside so as to affect the rights of bona fide purchasers under it,[10] even though the judgment or decree was procured through fraud,[11] or was erroneous and if appropriate review proceedings had been taken would have been reversed;[12] but they are not protected against errors which show that the court was without jurisdiction to render the decree.[13] The rights of one who is not a bona fide purchaser will not be protected,[14] and this includes a party litigant in the original proceeding who purchased through or under the judgment and immediate and remote vendees of such party litigant.[15] It has also been held that there can be no such thing as innocent purchasers in cases where statutes permitting an infant after attaining majority to show cause against a judgment or decree rendered against him during infancy, considered infra subdivision b of this section, apply, as in such cases the statute is notice to the world.[16] However, where such statutes expressly so provide, the rights of bona fide purchasers are protected;[17] and thereunder a purchaser who was a stranger to the record until the time of the sale is considered a bona fide purchaser whose rights are not affected by the vacation of the judgment or decree,[18] but a party to the suit, or an attorney in the case, or the plaintiff procuring the judgment, or an assignee of such plaintiff are not bona fide purchasers whose rights are protected.[19]

g. Proceedings

(1) In general
(2) Requisites and sufficiency of proceedings

(1) In General

A void judgment or decree is subject to either direct or collateral attack, but if it is merely voidable it can only be attacked directly. The particular procedure to be followed varies somewhat in the different jurisdictions, but in general consists of some form of procedure in the cause itself, such as an appeal, motion in the cause or bill of review, or an original or independent suit or action.

An absolutely void judgment or decree rendered in a proceeding to which a minor is a party may be attacked directly by such party,[20] or, as appears supra § 122 a, it is subject to collateral attack. If the judgment or decree is merely voidable or erroneous and not absolutely void it can only be attacked directly,[21] and, as appears supra § 122 a, it

An infant who is a party to a decree can only assail it directly.—McCampbell v. is not subject to collateral attack. On direct attack the particular method to be employed depends on the procedures authorized in the jurisdiction and their availability in the particular case, as affected by the time as of which relief is sought, considered supra subdivision b of this section, and the grounds on which it is based, considered supra subdivision d of this section. It has been variously held that relief may be obtained through appeal or writ of error, considered infra § 126, motion for a new trial, considered supra § 119, motion for a rehearing, considered supra § 119, motion made during the term at which the judgment or decree was rendered to set it aside,[22] or other motion,[23] amended pleading in the pending action,[24] petition to open a final decree and order to show cause issued thereon,[25] by bill of review,[26] bill in the nature of a bill of review,[27] or a statutory action to review for error.[28] However, as a general rule it is not necessary to proceed in this manner,[29] but the infant may maintain an original or independent suit or action to impeach or avoid the judgment or decree,[30] and it is Generally see Equity §§ 635–655.

As:
Direct or collateral attack see Equity § 635 a.

Nature of bill

The bill of review is an equitable proceeding.—Griggs v. Brewster, Civ. App., 16 S.W.2d 839, denying rehearing 15 S.W.2d 1114, and affirmed 62 S.W.2d 980, 122 Tex. 588.

Right of possession unnecessary

An infant remainderman who was a party to a foreclosure proceeding on his remainder interest need not have a right of possession in order to bring a bill of review to set aside the decree.—McCampbell v. Warrich Corporation, C.C.A.Ill., 109 F.2d 115, certiorari denied 60 S.Ct. 1077, 310 U.S. 631, 84 L.Ed. 1401, rehearing denied 61 S.Ct. 55, second case, 311 U.S. 612, 85 L.Ed. 388, and 61 S.Ct. 1089, 313 U.S. 599, 85 L.Ed. 1551.

Consent judgment

Where agreed judgment in minor's action is against interests of minor and facts making it so are not disclosed to court approving agreement for judgment, minor may, as between parties to judgment, have it set aside by bill of review.—Greathouse v. Fort Worth & D. C. Ry. Co., Tex. Com.App., 65 S.W.2d 762, reversing Fort Worth & D. C. Ry. Co. v. Greathouse, Civ.App., 41 S.W.2d 418.

28. Ind.—Attica Building & Loan Ass'n of Attica v. Colvert, 23 N.E. 2d 483, 216 Ind. 192.

Nature of proceeding

An action to review a judgment for error is in the nature of a petition for rehearing, and is not independent of, but is incidental to, the main action; it is a method by which the court which tried the case may have the opportunity to correct its own error.—Attica Building & Loan Ass'n of Attica v. Colvert, supra.

Proper practice

Under statutes authorizing infant within twelve months after attaining majority to proceed to set aside a judgment, proper practice is to make application to vacate judgment by an independent action.—Wilson's Adm'r v. Wilson, 156 S.W.2d 832, 288 Ky. 522.

By curator or next friend

Minors had right to petition court in name of their curator and their mother as next friend to vacate erroneous default judgment for cross complainant, claiming title to mortgaged land as purchaser at tax sale in suit by curator and mortgage trustee to foreclose mortgage securing note for money loaned by curator on minors' behalf, and cross complainant's demurrer to petition was improperly sustained, where judgment expressly recited that curator and minors failed to answer or demur to cross complaint.—Arkansas Trust Co. v. Sims, 133 S.W. 2d 854, 198 Ark. 1143.

unnecessary first to obtain the consent of the court to the filing of such a bill,[31] or to apply for a rehearing or to file a bill of review.[32]

Under some statutes the proceeding to vacate or modify the decree, even though it partakes of the nature of an independent action and is designated by a case number different from that of the original action, must be regarded as a continuation of the original action,[33] and thus is not subject to the restrictions that ordinarily obtain in an action where the parties seek to obtain equitable relief from a judgment brought as an original and independent action in the strict sense.[34]

The procedure prescribed by statute for obtaining relief from an improper judgment against an infant should be followed,[35] but strict conformity with the prescribed and technical rules of procedure will not be required where a trial on the merits is substantially realized and afforded by the method adopted.[36] Under some statutes the proper procedure after term is by petition to vacate[37] where the condition of the infant does not appear in the record, or the error in the proceedings.[38] In some jurisdictions it has been held that an infant party who was represented by attorney of record must institute a separate action in order to obtain relief.[39] In other jurisdictions if the decree is not void on the face of the record it can be attacked only by appeal, considered infra § 126, or by a bill of review or a bill in the nature of a bill of review;[40] and in still other jurisdictions it has been held that a direct action to annul the judgment, and not an appeal, is the proper remedy where the record does not disclose the evidence necessary to establish the grounds on which the judgment is attacked.[41] It is no objection to an original bill to impeach or avoid a judgment or decree that the minority of the complainant does not appear on the face of the proceedings attacked.[42] If a judgment against an infant was procured by fraud and collusion a suit in equity to set it aside is a proper remedy;[43] and a direct attack for fraud, collusion, or neglect may be made on a consent judgment in favor of a minor which was approved by the court.[44]

A writ of error coram nobis, considered generally in the C.J.S. title Judgments §§ 311–313, also 34 C.J. p 390 note 54–p 402 note 56, where not superseded by other statutory procedures, is an appropriate remedy in a proper case by which to attack a judgment against an infant,[45] as is also an application in the nature of a writ of error coram nobis.[46]

If the judgment is void it may be annulled in a direct action after the time for appeal or other procedure in the cause has elapsed,[47] as by an action to cancel the judgment,[48] or, as appears supra § 122 a, it may be attacked collaterally, in which case a motion to quash the execution is an appropriate meth-

Ancient procedure
At the common law the recovery of a judgment against an infant for whom a next friend or guardian ad litem had not been designated, on the assumption that he was an adult, was regarded as an error of fact not apparent of record, remediable by the ancient writ of error coram nobis or coram vobis, depending on whether the cause was in the king's bench or the common pleas.—La Bell v. Quasdorf, 184 A. 750, 116 N. J.Law 368.

od by which to proceed.[49]

Where a minor mortgaged lands, and a scire facias was sued out on the mortgage, and the premises sold for less than the sum due and a judgment was rendered for the balance, on a bill by the minor to enjoin this judgment, alleging his minority and want of notice of the proceedings at law, it was held that his only remedy was at law through a writ of error.[50]

(2) Requisites and Sufficiency of Proceedings

The rules governing the requisites and sufficiency of the various procedures by which judgments generally are avoided or impeached ordinarily apply, as, for example, that the proceeding be instituted in the court where the judgment or decree attacked was rendered, that it be on notice, with the necessary parties and sufficient pleadings, and that the petitioner has the burden of proof.

The rules governing the various procedures by which it is proper to avoid or impeach judgments or decrees generally, considered in the C.J.S. titles Equity §§ 622–682 and Judgments §§ 228–435, also 34 C.J. p 207 note 5–p 501 note 2, p 511 note 46–p 567 note 71, apply, except as varied by specific statutory provisions, to proceedings to avoid or impeach judgments or decrees rendered in proceedings to which infants were parties.[51] As a general rule such proceedings should be commenced in the court in which the judgment or decree was rendered;[52] but in some jurisdictions an independent suit to set aside the judgment of an inferior court for fraud extrinsic to the issues may be instituted in a court of record without first seeking relief in the inferior court.[53] They must be on notice to the other parties to the decree,[54] and those holding adversely under the judgment,[55] under some statutes it being required that a summons issue and be served as in the commencement of an action.[56]

Parties. The proceeding to impeach or avoid the judgment or decree should be instituted by the infant through his representative, if commenced before reaching his majority, or by the infant himself after that date.[57] The other parties to the judgment or decree attacked,[58] persons claiming under the decree,[59] and all those against whom some form of relief is sought[60] should in general be made parties to the proceeding; but it is not necessary to join a party to the original proceeding who has no further interest in the litigation and against whom no relief is sought.[61]

Pleadings. Under the controlling statutes and rules applicable in various jurisdictions there is required a formal petition, application, or complaint[62]

51. Different rule of procedure not followed
While it is the duty of courts to protect the interest of minors represented by a guardian ad litem, still no rule of procedure different from that enjoyed by other litigants should be made.—Griggs v. Brewster, Tex.Civ.App., 16 S.W.2d 839, denying rehearing 15 S.W.2d 1114, and affirmed 62 S.W.2d 980, 122 Tex. 588.

Matter in support of notice of application
Failure to set aside judgment on duly verified,[63] setting forth the judgment or decree,[64] except where the application is made by amended pleading in the pending action, as in such case the judgment is already a part of the record,[65] and setting forth the grounds to vacate,[66] and the defense to the action if the party applying was defendant.[67] Under some statutes it is unnecessary for the infant in order to have the judgment modified or set aside to aver or show diligence in the preparation of his defense to the action,[68] or the discovery of testimony;[69] nor in such case is it necessary to allege any of the special grounds for which new trials are granted to adults.[70] If the judgment or decree is attacked for fraud, whether directly in an independent proceeding[71] or collaterally,[72] the facts relied on as constituting the fraud must be specifically alleged.

Evidence and burden of proof. The burden is on the infant to establish the ground on which he seeks to vacate or set aside the judgment,[73] and he must show that injustice has been done him.[74] If the infant was the plaintiff in the proceeding he must verdict for plaintiff in negligence case because of defendant's infancy was held not reversible error, where nothing was presented to trial judge in support of defendant's notice of application to vacate judgment on such ground, defendant's testimony that he was under age being no part of record.—Steelman v. Failure to verify

Failure to verify petition for the vacation of an erroneous judgment rendered against an infant may be taken advantage of by a rule to verify the petition, but it is not ground for demurrer.—Berryhill v. Holland, 99 S.W. 902, 124 Ky. 615, 30 Ky.L. 831.

Averments held sufficient

(1) In suit to set aside construction of will.—Kennard v. Wiggins, 160 S.W.2d 706, 349 Mo. 283, certiorari denied Wiggins v. Kennard, 63 S. Ct. 47, 317 U.S. 652, 87 L.Ed. 524.

(2) Allegations of fact in count to set aside judgment rendered in suit brought by infant's father as next friend, for personal injuries, held sufficiently to show fraud and inadequacy, even though formal statement to that effect was not made.—Gilliland v. Bondurant, 59 S.W.2d 679, 332 Mo. 881, affirming, App., 51 S.W. 2d 559.

Statement of grounds held insufficient

(1) Allegation that there were a number of witnesses who had knowledge of transactions involved, who were available to testify but who were not called as witnesses, was not sufficient.—Chenault v. State Bank & Trust Co., 128 S.W.2d 715, 278 Ky. 453.

(2) Complaint, in action for release from judgment, not showing guardian for infant defendant was fraudulently appointed or neglected duties held demurrable.—Colvert v. Colvert, 178 N.E. 692, 95 Ind.App. 325, rehearing overruled 180 N.E. 192, 95 Ind.App. 325.

Failure to allege defense

Failure of defendant petitioning after arrival at majority for vacation of judgment rendered against him during his majority without any defense being made or proof offered to set forth any defense to the action does not render the petition insufficient where the law provides that all allegations of a petition against an infant must be proved, even though not traversed.—Berryhill v. Allegations held insufficient

In suit by remainderman, after reaching his majority, collaterally attacking mortgage foreclosure decree, general allegations of fraud, conspiracy, and collusion among mortgagee's assignee, purchaser of life estates, and guardian ad litem, with respect to foreclosure proceedings and failure to apply earnings of property to liquidation of mortgage, were insufficient to show fraud of guardian ad litem.—McCampbell v. Necessity for court to investigate

show that he had a meritorious cause of action on which the judgment debtor was liable;[75] but if the infant was a defendant in the proceeding he must show that he had a good defense to the cause of action and that he was prevented from making it.[76] A motion to set aside a judgment on account of defendant's minority must be sustained by proof that he had not arrived at full age at the date of the rendition of the judgment.[77] A defendant in a proceeding by an infant to vacate the judgment against him is not limited to a demurrer or plea of release of error, but may by answer controvert the allegations of the petition where it brings in question matters of fact considered by the court at the time the judgment was rendered;[78] but, where an infant after reaching majority seeks to open a judgment for an error not appearing on the face of the record, the judgment sought to be opened cannot be made the basis of a plea of res judicata.[79]

Evidence aliunde the record may be resorted to in a proceeding to vacate an apparently valid judgment commenced within the time allowed by law.[80]

Issues. Issues of fact are for the jury.[81]

h. Relief Awarded

Where relief against the judgment is granted the court should restore the parties to their former positions as nearly as possible and should require an accounting of property and money received under the judgment vacated. An infant who fails to obtain relief will not be allowed costs.

Where the infant succeeds in showing that the judgment should not have been rendered the court should place him and the other parties in statu quo as nearly as this can be done;[82] and, although as appears supra subdivision e of this section it is not always required that the infant tender or return the property or money received in satisfaction of the judgment or decree sought to be vacated as a prerequisite to the institution of the proceedings therefor, it is generally held that where the judgment or decree is vacated provision must be made for an accounting for such property or money on final determination of the cause of action.[83] On petition by a defendant after attaining his majority to vacate a judgment entered pro confesso without any hearing of evidence during his minority the court should not adjudge the judgment void but should set it aside and allow defendant a reasonable time in which to file an answer.[84]

Costs. Where a judgment against an infant plaintiff is revoked because of his infancy costs will not be allowed him.[85]

§ 124. —— Payment and Satisfaction of Judgment in Infant's Favor

As a general rule, in the absence of statutory authorization, the guardian ad litem or next friend of an infant, or the infant himself, is not authorized to receive payment of a judgment in favor of the infant and give satisfaction therefor, but only the infant's regularly qualified guardian or the court can do so.

It is generally held, sometimes under statutes providing to that effect, that a guardian ad litem or next friend of an infant in whose favor a judgment has been rendered is not authorized to receive the

he was not negligent and that injured infant was are undisputed, court should have investigated matter and made findings of fact before setting aside consent judgment.—Patrick v. Bryan, 162 S.E. 207, 202 N.C. 62.

friend ordinarily is authorized to receive payment of the judgment and acknowledge satisfaction thereof he is without such authority where the appointment, as well as the judgment, was fraudulently obtained.[99]

An infant, on becoming of age, is competent to sign a satisfaction of the judgment.[1]

Payment into court. Where there is no one authorized to receive the amount of a judgment in favor of an infant, it is proper to direct that the money, when collected, shall be paid into court,[2] subject to the order of the legally constituted guardian when such a one shall appear,[3] or to remain in court until the infant arrives at majority,[4] or, under some statutes, subject to be withdrawn by any proper person by giving the required bond and securing an order from the court, entered of record, authorizing him to do so.[5]

Power of court to confirm settlement and irregular satisfaction. The trial court which rendered the judgment has power in the exercise of its discretion to confirm a settlement of the judgment made during the pendency of an appeal for an amount smaller than the judgment and, even though the guardian ad litem had no legal right to accept payment of the judgment, to approve such payment, where it was properly expended, and render valid and binding a release and satisfaction of judgment executed therefor.[6]

Necessity to give security. Under statutes providing that a guardian ad litem or next friend may not receive payment for a judgment due to the infant until he has given security duly approved by the court, if such person does not give the required security he cannot proceed to collect the judgment, and the payment does not constitute satisfaction.[7] A judgment for an infant should not authorize its payment to the guardian ad litem or next friend without requiring him to give the bond.[8] A guardian ad litem who without order of court deposits such recovery in a savings bank is not relieved from liability.[9]

Satisfaction prior to payment. It is improper to satisfy the judgment before payment is made.[10]

§ 125. Execution and Enforcement of Judgment

General rules, in the absence of specific statutes, control executions on, and other enforcement of, judgments recovered by or against infants.

The general rules as to the issuance of execution are applicable, in so far as may be, to the issuance of executions to enforce judgments recovered by or against infants.

In favor of infant. Where an infant sues by next friend, and recovers judgment, which is affirmed by the supreme court, but the opinion and judgment of affirmance ignore the next friend, treating the judgment as for plaintiff in person, execution properly issues in the name of the infant.[11] The issuance of execution in favor of an infant sometimes is suspended until there is some person authorized to receive the money.[12] Statutes providing that a next friend who has prosecuted a personal action on behalf of an infant will not be allowed to receive the proceeds of the judgment until he has executed a bond therein provided for do not prevent an authorized levying officer from proceeding with the collection of the execution issued on such a judgment.[13]

Against infant. Except as otherwise provided by statute,[14] the general rule is that, where a judgment

The general rule is that a judgment for the sole benefit of minors should be paid into registry of court, especially where minors are represented in suit by next friend.—Wilson v. Fisher, Tex.Civ.App., 105 S.W. 2d 304, error refused, certiorari denied 58 S.Ct. 264, 302 U.S. 746, 82 L.Ed. 577.

has been rendered against an infant, execution may issue against his property the same as in the case of a judgment against an adult,[15] if there is no guardianship pending.[16] In some jurisdictions the manner of execution of judgments against infants is regulated by statute.[17]

Restraining execution of judgment. The execution of a judgment against an infant may, in a proper case, be restrained by injunction.[18] It has been held that where the infant has a right to vacate or modify the judgment the levy of an execution under the judgment will not be restrained without first taking steps to vacate or modify it.[19] The bill or complaint seeking the injunction should allege all the facts necessary to warrant its grant.[20]

a. In General

Matters relating to appeal and error in actions by or against infants are, in the absence of statute, controlled by general rules.

An infant has the right to appeal from a judgment against him, where the judgment if against an adult would be appealable.[21] An infant may appeal from a decree of foreclosure in a proceeding to which he was a party although he does not have a right to possession.[22]

Nature and form of remedy. Where no guardian ad litem has been appointed for the infant, he cannot, it has been held, proceed by bill of exceptions[23] but the proper procedure is by writ of error.[24] In other jurisdictions, where the record on its face shows that appellant was an infant or if the question has been submitted to, and decided by, the lower court, an erroneous judgment may be corrected on appeal.[25] Under express provisions of the statutes in some jurisdictions if injustice is done to an infant and the injustice does not appear on the face of the record, he may have the judgment modified or set aside in the trial court;[26] but if the error occurs on the face of the record the remedy of the infant is by appeal,[27] in which case his relief is the same as his relief by action where the error is not shown by the record.[28] Under a statute permitting the obtaining by an infant of a new trial after judgment, either by petition in the trial court or by appeal, the infant cannot adopt both means of procuring a new trial for the same error.[29]

Duty to appeal. It is the duty of the guardian ad litem in a proper case to appeal from a decision adverse to his ward[30] or to enter an appearance on an appeal from a decree affecting his interests,[31] and the court may direct him to defend an appeal from a decree favorable to the minor;[32] further to levy it.—Newbern Bank v. Stanly, 13 N.C. 476.

he should be given leave to employ counsel to assist him where necessary.[33]

Waiver or release of error. Where a writ of error is brought to reverse a judgment recovered on a note against an infant who appeared by attorney, a promise made by him after he comes of age to pay the note is neither a release or waiver of the error nor a bar to a writ of error.[34] The question whether a minor has waived his right to disaffirm a judgment by permitting it to be rendered against him without notifying the trial court of his minority is one of fact to be determined by the record.[35]

Certiorari. To the extent and within the limits discussed in the title in this work of that name, certiorari is a proper remedy to be pursued by an infant.[36]

Successive proceedings. Minor appellants giving notice of an appeal cannot prosecute a writ of error after expiration of the time for filing a transcript on appeal.[37]

b. Presentation and Reservation in Lower Court of Grounds for Review

As against adult parties, and to some extent as against infant parties, only matters presented and reserved in the lower court will be reviewed; however, the rule is much relaxed in favor of infant parties for the protection of their rights.

As against adult parties the appellate court will enforce the rule that only grounds of exception presented and reserved in the lower court will be considered.[38] Hence a theory of the defense abandoned in the trial court is not before the reviewing court on appeal from a judgment for minors.[39] However, the rule that it is the duty of the courts to protect the interests of an infant litigant, as discussed supra § 105, applies to appellate courts.[40] Hence it has been laid down that on appeal an infant will be given the benefit of every defense of which he could have availed himself or which might have been interposed for him in the trial court,[41] although there is no appeal on his part.[42] It has, however, been held that, where the infant is properly represented, he is bound by the action of the court with respect to mere errors of law, not involving jurisdiction, as though he had been an adult;[43] and there are some cases where, the infant being properly represented in the lower court, the appellate court has refused to consider objections not raised in the lower court.[44] The review-

In the absence of fraud or collusion on the part of the infants' guardian ad litem the appellate court will not pass upon objections which could have been made and the merits of a case in which final judgment has been rendered.—Betsill v. Betsill, 196 S.E. 381, 187 S.C. 50.

Suit for minor's benefit Error in instructions is unavailable in the absence of exceptions or requests for additional instructions although adversely affecting a minor's interests in an administrator's statutory action for the death of the minor's parent since the infant is ing court may follow the trial court's treatment of the nature of a motion, from the denial of which an appeal has been taken.[45]

c. Parties

Ordinarily an infant must appeal by a representative, either the guardian ad litem or the next friend who appeared for him in the trial court or a representative appointed for the purposes of the appeal; but after attaining his majority the infant may prosecute the appeal in his own behalf.

Although it has been stated categorically that an infant may not individually prosecute or maintain an appeal,[46] it has also been held that an appeal taken by an infant himself is an act voidable by him,[47] and on motion of his guardian ad litem, appointed after such appeal, the court may dismiss the appeal.[48]

The rule that a motion for a new trial is indivisible cannot be invoked to defeat the review of an appeal on a meritorious petition in error filed by an infant defendant, whose guardian has inadvertently joined her in a motion for a new trial and petition in error with a nominal defendant who has no rights involved in the controversy.[49] Where an appeal in the interests of the infants brings before the court the entire matter in controversy with regard to a conveyance for their support, which is alleged to be fraudulent, it is immaterial whether the grantee prosecutes the appeal or whether the committee of the grantor, standing in the place of the grantor, has any interest.[50]

Appeal by guardian ad litem or next friend. A guardian ad litem or next friend does not necessarily become functus officio by the rendition of a judgment or decree,[51] and, as discussed in Appeal and Error § 194 a, he may be the proper person to take an appeal on behalf of the infant. When an appeal is taken by a guardian ad litem his powers and duties continue until the final termination of the cause,[52] unless he is removed by the court[53] or the guardianship is terminated by the arrival of the infant at majority, a matter discussed infra notes 63–65. The fact that an appeal is improperly taken in the name of the guardian ad litem instead of in the name of the infant by his guardian ad litem does not require its dismissal,[54] nor does the fact that an appeal is taken in the minor's name instead of in that of his guardian deprive the appellate court of jurisdiction.[55] Where there is a presumption of law that there are no unknown heirs, a guardian ad litem appointed to represent unknown heirs cannot prosecute an appeal.[56] It has been held that an appellate court could strike a brief filed by an infant's guardian ad litem who stated that his convictions were such that he could represent only the interests of those opposed to his ward.[57]

Appointment of representative. Proceedings in review of a judgment are a continuation of the original case,[58] and hence the guardian ad litem or next friend who appeared for the infant in the original case is entitled to appear for him in the appellate court,[59] and it is not necessary or proper to appoint a new guardian ad litem or next friend on the appeal where the one who originally represented the infant appears;[60] but, where infant par-not a party to the suit.—Richard v. Neault, 135 A. 524, 126 Me. 17.

45. Motion to set aside verdict
Where invalidity of proceeding against infant, because of lack of appointment of guardian ad litem under statutes, was presented by infant, through his attorney, in motion designated as amendment to motion for new trial, affidavit of infant's guardian, stating the facts, was made part of motion, and trial court treated motion as one to set aside verdict and judgment against infant, reviewing court would so treat motion.—Brown v. ties are not properly represented, a person may be appointed by the appellate court to represent them.[61] It is not necessary that the next friend by whom a writ of error is prosecuted should be the same person who acted as next friend in the trial court.[62]

Effect of arrival at majority. Since the infant's arrival at majority terminates the guardianship, as considered supra § 113, the infant, and not the guardian ad litem or next friend, is the proper party to take and prosecute the appeal.[63] Where there are several infant defendants represented by a guardian ad litem and one of the infants arrives at majority, he may move to dismiss the appeal as to him, but the right of the guardian ad litem to take the appeal for him is not affected, nor is his right to maintain the appeal for the other infant defendants.[64] The action of an infant in bringing an appeal without representation may be considered ratified by resisting a motion to dismiss the appeal after attaining majority.[65]

Waiver of objections. It has been held that, if an infant sues out a writ of error in his own name and there is joinder in error, his disability is waived.[66]

d. Requisites and Proceedings for Transfer of Cause

Statutory requirements as to the proceedings for the transfer of a cause involving an infant's rights, such as the payment or security for costs and as to the time of the taking of an appeal and notice thereof, must be complied with.

Statutory requisites as to the taking of an appeal must be complied with.[67]

Payment or security for costs. Under statutory permission, on the filing of a sufficient affidavit by his next friend an infant may appeal in forma pauperis;[68] but an affidavit which shows the inability of the infant to pay costs, but does not show that the next friend is unable to pay costs or give security therefor, is insufficient.[69] An appeal taken by or on behalf of an infant whose guardian ad litem has become insolvent and has failed to pay the costs adjudged will not be stayed because of nonpayment of such costs.[70]

Time for appeal. In the absence of statute, an infant has no further time than an adult within which to take the necessary steps for the correction of errors in a proceeding or judgment against him.[71] Under the statutes of some jurisdictions an infant against whom or affecting whose interests a judgment has been rendered is allowed a certain time after reaching majority within which he may appeal or sue out a writ of error;[72] but such a

Female infants
The Missouri statute providing statute does not prevent the infant from taking an appeal, or suing out a writ of error by next friend or guardian during his minority.[73] It has been held that if an appeal is properly taken during infancy the infant loses his right to have the judgment opened after attaining majority.[74] In some jurisdictions the time within which a guardian ad litem or next friend may appeal is limited by statute, after which time his right to do so terminates.[75]

Notice of appeal. An infant against whom an appeal is prosecuted ordinarily is entitled to notice of appeal or summons in error,[76] within the time prescribed by the statute,[77] and service on the guardian or next friend is not sufficient to confer appellate jurisdiction over the infant.[78] This is especially true when the appeal is taken after the infant becomes of age.[79] It has been held that the attorney of record in the lower court may accept service of case-made, and that in such case the objection that summons in error was not properly served is without merit;[80] but a statute permitting service of notice on the attorney of record in the lower court does not apply where the record fails to show the authority of the attorney so served to act for the infant appellee or his guardian.[81] Under some statutes, where an infant is named as appellee and is served with notice of appeal, it is not necessary to name his guardian ad litem as appellee or to give him notice of appeal.[82] Where an appeal is taken on behalf of an infant, defendant in error is entitled to notice of appeal, and failure to give such notice within the time prescribed by statute is ground for dismissing the appeal.[83]

e. Record

General rules control as to the scope and contents of the record and the matters which must be shown thereby, such as the service of process, the appointment of a guardian ad litem, and the reception of evidence.

The failure of the record to show that minor defendants were served with process is a fundamental error requiring reversal,[84] which the minor may set up at any stage of the proceedings on appeal or writ of error,[85] and which the court will even notice on appeal ex mero motu;[86] but an adult plaintiff, claiming for the first time on a motion for rehearing on appeal that the record does not show service of process on an infant defendant, has the burden of showing affirmatively by the record that error has been committed.[87] An appellant cannot complain that the record fails to show the appointment of guardians ad litem for infant appellees when that fact is recited in the decree and the abstract shows their appearance.[88] On an appeal on the judgment roll by an adult defendant, proceedings relative to the appointment of a guardian ad litem for the infant plaintiff, not being embodied in any record, could not be considered.[89] The rules of practice in equitable actions regarding the necesthat a person within the age of twenty-one years has three years after the removal of the disability to sue out a writ of error applies to females within that age in spite of another statute declaring that females of eighteen years of age shall be considered of full age.—Audsley v. Hale, 261 S.W. 117, 303 Mo. 451.

Showing as to age

Where petition for writ of error and verified exhibits including a certified copy of birth certificate disclosed that plaintiff in error became of age within three years prior to filing of writ of error, in absence of any denial, supreme court would consider the statements true and assume that writ of error was sued out within three years after removal of disability.—Campbell v. Necessary parties

In action to recover on special pavement assessment certificates issued by city purporting to be a lien on property involved where assessment lien and contract lien were asserted and judgment seemed to foreclose both, record failed to show that infant defendants were not necessary parties so as to render harmless failure to serve process on some of them.—Ginn v. sity and manner of making evidence heard orally before the court a part of the record for purposes of review apply alike to infants and adults.[90]

f. Review

The scope and extent of review are in general controlled by the rules applicable in other proceedings, as, for example, with reference to the persons entitled to allege error, the presumptions which will be indulged, the review of matters of discretion and of questions of fact, and as to errors which are regarded as prejudicial.

Since an infant is bound by the judgment or decree rendered in the action, infancy alone is no ground for reversal;[91] and the rules applicable in other cases as to the scope of the review, discussed in Appeal and Error §§ 1453–1834, and as to the determination of the cause on appeal, discussed in Appeal and Error §§ 1835–2003, generally control.

Moot questions. The question presented by an appeal from an order denying a motion to vacate the appointment of a guardian ad litem, having become an academic one by the resignation of the guardian, will not be considered by the court.[92]

Parties entitled to allege error. The omission of the next friend of an infant plaintiff to give bond to secure the proceeds of a judgment to be recovered cannot be assigned as error by defendant on appeal, since he is not injured or prejudiced and it does not concern him.[93] An adult plaintiff, after active participation in the trial below, is estopped to assert for the first time on a motion for a rehearing on appeal that the deceased defendant's minor daughter had not been served with a citation where the error is not apparent on the face of the record.[94] Where the general guardian of the minor appeared and resisted a petition, the petitioner could not complain on appeal of the failure to appoint a guardian ad litem.[95]

Presumptions. The appellate court will presume that the lower court duly protected the interest of the infant.[96] Where the decree appealed from recites the appointment of a guardian ad litem it will be presumed that the appointment was regularly made[97] and that the court found that the guardian ad litem had been appointed in due time;[98] but where the record does not show the appointment of a guardian ad litem for an infant defendant no presumption exists that such an appointment has been made,[99] and there is no presumption that a minor defendant against whom a judgment has been rendered was served with process.[1]

Discretion of court. The general rule, stated in Appeal and Error § 1583, that the appellate court will not review or revise the trial court's actions or rulings with reference to matters resting in the latter's judicial discretion in the absence of a showing of an abuse of that discretion has been applied in cases involving infants.[2] Similarly the rule that the complaining party has the burden of showing that the trial court abused its discretion, discussed in Appeal and Error § 1584, has been applied to cases on appeal in which infants were parties.[3] An order of removal of a guardian ad litem or next

Legal necessity

Where mortgagors' minor heirs were represented by guardian ad litem, while defense to foreclosure suit was made for them by an attorney ad litem and heirs sui juris did not defend, it must be presumed on appeal that defense made for such minors was because of legal necessity.—Jacobs v. Requiring bond for costs

Failure of the trial court to require next friend of nonresident infant, who brought action for the infant, to execute bond for costs would not require reversal, where the infant was the successful litigant, in view of the fact that the statute is not mandatory.—Dr. Pepper Bottling Co. of Kentucky v. Hazelip, 144 S.W.2d 798, 284 Ky. 333.

3. Vacating judgment

On appeal from decision to vacate judgment on ground it erroneously deprived infants of their rights, appellants had burden to show that trial court abused its discretion in refusing to vacate judgment.—Betsill v. Betsill, 196 S.E. 381, 187 S.C. 50.

friend has been held not reviewable.[4] The amount of allowances by the lower court for fees of a guardian ad litem is reviewable by the appellate court.[5]

Questions of fact, verdicts, and findings. Since an appellate court, exercising strictly the functions of a court of review, generally is limited to the correction of errors of law, as discussed in Appeal and Error § 1642, a defendant who pleaded infancy at the trial below cannot assign his infancy as error when the triers of fact have found against his plea.[6] The reviewing court cannot take the allegations of a motion to set aside a judgment because of minority as true where the former unimpeached findings of the lower court show that the minor was of age on the date of the entry of judgment.[7]

Harmless error. Some courts have held that, where the interests of a minor litigant have been protected, failure to appoint a guardian is not ground for reversal;[8] but other courts have considered such failure to be reversible error.[9] The taking of evidence respecting matters affecting an infant's property rights without proper notice to his guardian ad litem has also been held to be prejudicial error.[10] A consent order entered by the attorneys and guardian ad litem for infant defendants will not be disturbed on appeal in the absence of a showing that the infants' interests were prejudiced thereby.[11] The failure by an infant's next friend to observe technical formalities in bringing a suit on his behalf does not constitute material error.[12] The rule stated in Appeal and Error § 1898, that the improper naming of the person bringing the action is not prejudicial error, has been applied to the case of an infant plaintiff.[13]

g. Determination and Disposition of Cause

General rules determine as to the disposition of the cause and as to further proceedings on remand.

Where an infant brings a writ of error to reverse a judgment rendered against him, the court only vacates the judgment, but does not set aside the proceedings altogether.[14] Where a complain-

No concern of opposite party

Where decree fully protects minor litigants, it is no concern of opposite party whether guardian ad litem was appointed.—Davison v. Heinrich, 172 N.E. 770, 340 Ill. 349.

Where an infant was defended by an attorney who filed a written motion for a new trial without specifying the failure to appoint a guardian ad litem, such failure cannot constitute a ground for reversal of the judgment against him.—Martin v. Starr, 255 Ill.App. 189.

Delay in appointment

(1) A judgment for defendant in action by motorist for damage to automobile resulting from collision, wherein defendant filed a counterclaim, would not be reversed on ground that motorist was a minor, where attention of court was first called to minority of motorist when motion for new trial was made, and thereafter motorist's mother was appointed guardian ad litem to act for him, and record indicated that proceedings would have been no different had guardian ad litem been appointed before trial.—Zielinski v. Pleason, 20 N.E.2d 620, 299 Ill.App. 594.

(2) Delay in the appointment of a guardian ad litem for a minor neither deprives the court of jurisdiction nor constitutes reversible error, where there is no showing of prejudice resulting therefrom.—Johnston v. Calvin, Iowa, 5 N.W.2d 840.

Prosecution of suit by infants in their own names

By virtue of specific statutory enactment a judgment for infants will not be disturbed, where they prosecuted suit by attorney in their own names, and not by guardian or curator, and where curator had removed from state.—Chapman v. Bimel-Ashcroft Mfg. Co., Mo., 263 S.W. 993.

ant's bill and a cross bill by an infant defendant were both dismissed, and on appeal by complainant the decree is reversed, the appellate court has no power to reinstate the cross bill or grant any relief on it; but in order that the infant may have an opportunity to assert his rights the cause will be remanded in order that another cross bill may be filed on behalf of the infant if it be deemed advisable.[15] A judgment against minors and adults as joint trespassers may be reversed as to the minors only, since no contribution could be compelled if one were obliged to pay the judgment.[16] Where in an action on notes against several defendants, one of them by a separate answer alleged infancy and the issue thus raised was submitted to the jury as a separate issue and the jury found for such defendant on such issue and also found for all the defendants on the general issue, it was held that the judgment in favor of infant defendant must stand, although as to other defendants the judgment was reversed.[17] Where a case is remanded to the chancery court with directions to appoint a guardian ad litem for the decedent's minor heirs, not made parties to a creditors' suit against the administrator, new pleadings may be filed in their behalf.[18] Where a judgment in favor of a minor is erroneous in directing a payment of a portion of the damages awarded to his attorneys, it will be modified by the appellate court to direct that such portion be deposited in the registry of the court subject to disbursement on a proper showing by the interested attorneys.[19]

§ 127. Costs

a. In general
b. In favor of or against infant
c. Against next friend or guardian ad litem

a. In General

The matter of costs usually is governed by the general rules relating thereto.

The matter of the right to, and liability for, costs generally is governed by the rules applicable in other civil actions.[20] While under some provisions of law a next friend may be required to give bond as security for costs, as discussed in Costs § 127 b, the requirements laid down by the statute must be fulfilled in order to compel him to do so.[21]

b. In Favor of or against Infant

Costs in favor of an infant when his success in the action is due to his plea of infancy are in general discretionary and apparently not favored; the authorities differ sharply as to the liability of an infant for costs when he is the unsuccessful party.

In favor of infant. Where on the trial of an action to recover for goods sold a verdict is directed in behalf of one of defendants on the ground of infancy, he is not entitled to costs as a matter of course, but their allowance depends on a special application to the court by which they may be withheld or allowed according to its sound discretion.[22] Where an infant defendant, joined with others, secures a nolle prosequi as to himself on account of infancy, he is not entitled to costs.[23] Where a defendant in an action on a joint liability who was not served voluntarily answers, pleading infancy, plaintiff may obtain leave to discontinue as to him without costs and such defendant cannot be allowed any costs in the action other than the costs of making his motion to compel plaintiff to receive his answer.[24] Where a judgment recovered against an infant on a note is reversed on writ of error because of the infancy of defendant below, the court will not give plaintiff in error costs unless it appears that plaintiff in the court below knew that he was an infant.[25] Where infant appellees are not

Attorney's fees as costs

(1) The fee for representing a minor defendant is allowed as compensation for services rendered the minor, but it is authorized to be taxed as a part of the cost of suit, and is deemed "costs" incurred by successful plaintiff within the meaning of the statute when the minor has no property or estate out of which the fee can be collected.—Bruni v. Vidaurri, Tex., 166 S.W.2d 81, affirming in part and reversing in part Viduarri v. Bruni, Civ.App., 154 S.W.2d 498.

(2) The costs allowed attorney for representing minor defendants, some of whom were served personally and some by publication, and all costs incident to issuance and publication of citations by publication before order consolidating suit with several other suits should be taxed against plaintiffs, in absence of proof sufficient for otherwise adjudging those items of cost.—Bruni v. represented by a guardian or next friend, the costs of the appeal should be taxed against the appellants, although the cause has been reversed.[26] Where an infant is appointed administrator and continues to act after becoming of age until the commencement of a suit, when he objects to the validity of his appointment on the ground of infancy, it has been held that he is not entitled to costs of a cross bill filed by him for the purpose of substituting in his place in the suit the administrator appointed on the revocation of the first appointment.[27]

Against infant. According to some authorities an infant plaintiff suing by guardian ad litem or next friend is liable for costs in case he is unsuccessful,[28] but this is denied by other authorities.[29] An infant defendant is not liable for costs in an action to which he is a necessary party because of his being the heir of the person against whom, if alive, the action should be brought,[30] but in other cases an infant defendant may be liable for costs.[31] The trust fund of a successful infant plaintiff, represented in the action by a next friend, may be charged with costs when its preservation or recovery results from such action.[32]

c. Against Next Friend or Guardian ad Litem

Although there is contrary authority, the next friend or guardian ad litem of an infant plaintiff generally is held liable for costs and the representative of an infant defendant is not, while an infant litigant's election to proceed with the action on becoming of age usually relieves his representative of liability for costs.

Although some authorities have held that the next friend is not liable for costs,[33] unless he has mismanaged the conduct of the suit or action or acted in bad faith,[34] or unless the court, in the exercise of a discretionary power conferred by statute, so directs,[35] the next friend or guardian ad litem of an unsuccessful infant plaintiff is as a general rule primarily liable for costs,[36] especially where the in-

(2) In a case specifically disagreeing with the conclusions reached in Goishen v. Samor Realty Co., supra, it has been held that the statute relieving infant's guardian ad litem from liability for costs, unless specially charged therewith by court order, did not relieve infant of liability therefor, and successful defendant may proceed under general statutes relating to costs for recovery thereof from unsuccessful infant plaintiff, who can avoid liability therefor only by suing as poor person.—Stevenson v. Contempt for nonpayment

Since at the time judgment was rendered against a plaintiff in an action by an infant by a guardian ad litem, the statute made the guardian liable for costs only if the court specially directed him to pay them because of mismanagement or bad faith in the action, an order refusing to punish him for contempt for not paying them was proper although at the time of the commencement of the action a statute, later repealed, was in effect making the guardian unconditionally liable for costs.—Huebl v. Costs of former suit

The liability of the next friend of an infant, unsuccessfully prosecuting a suit, for costs incurred by prevailing party, does not arise from the fact that he has, pursuant to an order of the court, executed a bond for costs, conditioned to pay all such costs as may be awarded against him, but he is liable to pay costs, whether he has or has not executed a bond.—State v. Oxley, 120 S.E. 383, 95 W.Va. 160.

fant's representative also seeks recovery on an individual cause of action[37] or is the real party in interest;[38] and he is also liable for costs on a reversal of his appeal.[39] However, in a jurisdiction where the imposition of costs on a guardian ad litem is discretionary, it has been held that he is not liable for costs as a party joined as plaintiff where there can be no costs against him in his representative capacity.[40] While the guardian ad litem of an infant defendant ordinarily is not chargeable with costs,[41] and a statute empowering the court so to charge the guardian will not be invoked where there has been no misconduct on the part of the representative, since it is intended for the protection of infants,[42] it has been held that a guardian ad litem who appeals on behalf of an infant defendant is liable for the costs of the appeal where the judgment is affirmed.[43]

If, after attaining majority, the infant elects to proceed with the cause, the next friend is discharged from liability for costs.[44] Some cases have held that this rule applies to costs already incurred and to future costs,[45] but other cases seem to limit the rule to future costs and not to costs already incurred.[46] However, in some jurisdictions by statute, unless the next friend applies to be relieved therefrom, he remains liable for the costs incurred both before and after the infant becomes of age[47]. It has been said that where an infant has become of age the court should not exercise its discretionary right to impose costs against the guardian ad litem.[48] In any event if the proper procedure has not been followed by the successful party costs cannot be imposed either on the quondam infant or his guardian ad litem on a motion to review taxation of costs,[49] although the costs will be disallowed without prejudice to further proceedings by defendant.[50]

Recognizance for costs. The next friend may properly recognize for costs in the suit under a statute requiring a recognizance by some person other than plaintiff.[51]

Reimbursement of next friend. A next friend who has acted in good faith and on probable grounds is entitled to be reimbursed for the costs that he has paid from the property of the infant.[52]

INFANZON. In Spanish feudal law, the noble who exercised no other powers than those lawfully conceded to him.[1]

INFATUATION. Act of infatuating, or state of being infatuated; folly; also, that which infatuates.[2]

It has been used as one of the synonyms of "intoxication."[3]

Double costs

Where action for damages for infant's illness was brought by infant's parents individually and as next friends of infant, and judgment for defendant was reversed on ground that the parents might recover expenses incurred in caring for the infant, costs on appeal as to the parents were required to abide final determination of the cause as to them, but defendant was entitled to double costs against the parents as infant's next friends, as to issue of defendant's liability to the infant.—Stave v. Giant Food Arcade, 17 A.2d 779, 126 N.J.Law 75.

Costs in both courts

If, on suggestion that the next friend of an infant about to prosecute a lawsuit is financially irresponsible, he executes a cost bond with approved security, and thereafter prevails in the circuit court, but loses on appeal, and the suit is dismissed, the prevailing party on appeal is entitled to a decree or judgment against the next friend for the costs in both courts.—State v. INFECT. To contaminate with any disease-producing substance, germs, or bacteria.[7]

Infected. The participial adjective meaning having undergone infection.[8]

Carrier's liability for injury to, or loss of, live stock unloaded in infected pens see Carriers § 43 b; and duty of warehouseman with reference to infected goods see the C.J.S. title Warehousemen and Safe Depositaries § 11, also 67 C.J. p 451 notes 83–88.

INFECTION. The word is susceptible of more than one interpretation; it has a definite technical meaning as understood by members of the medical profession and an entirely different meaning to those who are not learned in the medical sciences.[9] The ordinary conception of the word to the layman, as distinguished from the medical understanding of it is that infection is caused by any noxious substance inserted into the flesh, whether the substance be germ or poison, and hence is understood to mean the invasion of bacteria from the air into an opening or abrasion of the surface of the skin or body causing toxic or blood poisoning.[10]

In medical jurisprudence, the communication of disease, as by the entrance of pathogenic germs into an organism in any manner;[11] the communication of disease germs or virus by any means, direct or indirect;[12] the process of infecting;[13] the transmission of disease or disease germs from one person to another, either directly by contact with morbidly affected surfaces, or more remotely through inhalation, absorption of food or liquid tainted with excremental matter, contact with contaminated clothing or bedding, or other agencies;[14] also that which infects, or causes the communicated disease;[15] the subtle or virulent matter proceeding from diseased bodies and imparting the same to others.[16] Depending on the circumstances, it may,[17] or may not,[18] include internal inflammation where pus is formed by the reason of pus germs, as distinguished from external injuries infected by bacteria from the air; and so, specifically, it has been said that an ulcer is an infection,[19] but that eczema is not see 28 C.J.S. p 829 note 93.

"Infection" has been said to be nearly synonymous with, although in some respects it is distinguished from, "contagion" see 16 C.J.S. p 1523 note 50; and to be both distinguishable and not distinguishable from "poison" or "poisoning" see the C.J.S. title Poisons § 1.

In international law, "infection," with reference to the contraband of goods, is said to be the liability of a particular owner to a derivative condemnation of his goods, arising as an incident of the owner's position when the seizure is made and the captor's right arises.[20]

INFECTIOUS. Capable of communicating infection; contaminating; that infects, taints, or corrupts.[21] While it is true that lexicographers and scientific persons observe a well-defined difference in the meanings of the words "contagious" and "infectious," the latter term may properly be used to express the property of transmissibility of certain diseases.[22]

Infectious disease. A disease capable of being transmitted or communicated by means of infection.[23] In its technical use, it presupposes a cause acting by hidden influences, like the miasma of prison ships or marshes, etc., or through the pollution of water or the atmosphere, or from the various dejections from animals.[24]

It is sometimes used interchangeably, and sometimes compared, with "contagious disease" see 16 C.J.S. p 1523 notes 54–56.

Quarantine regulations and other provisions concerning infectious and contagious diseases see Health §§ 12–20. For references to other particular applications consult the Descriptive-Word Index sub verbo Contagious and Infectious Diseases.

INFER. Derived from the Latin inferre, compounded of "in" from, and "ferre" to carry or bring,[28] and defined as meaning to bring into, to bring forward;[29] to bring a result or conclusion from something back of it, that is, from some evidence or data from which it may be logically deduced.[30]

"Inferred" has been held synonymous with "implied" see 42 C.J.S. p 406 note 39; and has been distinguished from "presumed."[31]

INFERENCE. Although the noun "inference," as commonly understood, may mean the actual fact inferred, strictly it means the process or reasoning in reaching the fact and not the fact itself;[32] and it has been defined generally as the act or process of inferring;[33] a process of reasoning by which a fact or proposition sought to be established is deduced as a logical consequence from other facts, or a state of facts, already proved or admitted;[34] and, in

Process discussed
"The very process of inference involves the process of one fact or a set of facts pushing forward in the mind the probability of the inferred fact. Sometimes the basic fact or facts from which the inference arises strongly urge to any reasonable mind the inferred fact. At other times, the process of inference is more tenuous. And true it is, that where the fact attempted to be inferred is pushed or carried out of the basic facts with no more urgency than some other fact, the inferences are said to be equal and cancel each other. Perhaps the more accurate way to state the proposition is that the mind in its natural functioning does not bring forward

logic, as the derivation of a judgment or conclusion from any given material of knowledge or thought on the assumed ground of a real interdependence of things conformably to law;[35] a thought or idea not represented by the words used but to be deduced therefrom.[36]

In law, the term has been generally defined as meaning a conclusion, a deduction, that which is inferred;[37] a conclusion drawn by reason from premises, or facts, established by proof;[38] a conclusion or a deduction from facts or propositions known to be true or from facts proved;[39] a deduction which the trier may or may not make according to his own conclusions;[40] a permissible deduction from the evidence;[41] something inferred from precedent matter, separated from which it is a mere absurdity any fact from the underlying facts because, being in a condition of equipoise, no inferable fact is brought forward or pushed out of the underlying facts as a natural conclusion."—Salt Lake County v. Industrial Commission, 120 P.2d 321, 323, 101 Utah 167.

In a comprehensive sense it embraces Jews as well as heathen, that is, all who do not believe the Christian religion.—Omychund v. Barker, 1 Atk. 21, 25, 26 Reprint 15, Willes 538, 125 Reprint 1310, 11 E.R.C. 126.

More specifically

An infidel is "one who does not believe the Bible, or that Jesus Christ was the true Messiah; the 'Christ of God'—can no more be a Protestant, than he can a Roman Catholic, because he lacks the first and chief qualification of either, viz., a belief in Christianity; for while he, with the Protestant, denies the authority of the pope, he differs from both in not believing the Bible, or Jesus Christ and his religion. The infidel and the pagan stand alike; they are both anti-Catholic, and equally anti-Protestant. . . . Jews believe in the Old Testament, and not in the New. Mohammedans receive the whole Bible in a sense, but receive and acknowledge the Alcoran as a higher authority, and accept Mohammed as a greater prophet than Jesus. Neither believes the system of Christianity, as taught in the New Testament. They are both, alike, anti-Catholic and anti-Protestant. . . . A Roman Catholic is a Christian who admits the authority of the pope; a Protestant is a Christian who denies that authority; and no one not a Christian can be either a Catholic or a Protestant, any more than a man can be a Jew who does not believe in Moses or the Pentateuch, or than he could be a Mohammedan who did not believe in Mohammed or the Alcoran."—Hale v. Scope of the term

(1) The expression covers not only all well-known and easily recognised conditions and degrees of intoxication, but any abnormal mental or physical condition which is the result of indulging in any degree in intoxicating liquors and which tends to deprive one so indulging of that clearness of intellect and control of himself which he would otherwise possess.—Packard v. O'Neil, 262 P. 881, 884, 45 Idaho 427, 58 A.L.R. 317.

The phrase has been held equivalent to "intoxicated"[5] and "in a state of intoxication,"[6] and has been distinguished from "drunkenness"[7] and "while intoxicated."[8] Other phrases of similar import are set out in the note.[9]

As used to describe the condition of the driver of a motor vehicle see the C.J.S. title Motor Vehicles § 625, also 42 C.J. p 1329 notes 13–19 and p 1331 notes 57–60.

"Undue influence." It has been said that the term, while easily comprehended and understood, is somewhat difficult to define;[10] that it is easier to say what it is not rather than what it is;[11] and that no definition of what the law denominates "undue influence" can be given which will furnish a safe and reliable test for every case, for each case must be decided on its own special facts.[12] All that can be said, in the way of formulating a general rule on this subject, is that whatever destroys free agency and constrains the person whose act is brought in judgment to do what is against his will and what he would not have done if left to himself is "undue influence,"[13] no matter by what means the control is exercised,[14] whether by physical force,

(2) It has been said that the phrase "while under the influence of or affected by intoxicants" interpreted strictly and literally would include being under the influence of liquor to any extent, but that, in ordinary acceptation, it means so far under the influence as to constitute a state of intoxication.—Murdie v. Maryland Casualty Co., D.C.Nev., 52 F.2d 888, 892.

(4) Solicitation, importunity, and persuasion are not necessarily undue influence, but with a person of great age, feeble physically and mentally, where the relations between the parties are intimate, they may constitute undue influence.—Geddes v. McElroy, 154 N.W. 320, 328, 171 Iowa 633.

(5) "Suggestion and advice, addressed to the understanding and judgment, do not constitute undue influence; nor does solicitation, unless the party be so worn by the importunities that his will gives way. Earnest entreaty, importunity, and persuasion may be employed; but, if the influence is not irresistible, it is not undue, and its existence is immaterial, even though it is yielded to."—Tabb v. (6) The influence which a wife by her virtue, love, and sacrifices gains over her husband's affections does not constitute undue influence, but it must go beyond legitimate argument and persuasion and amount to domination or coercion.—Craycroft v. Crawford, Tex.Civ.App., 275 S.W. 124, 126.

(7) The improper influence which the law denounces as "undue" does not consist in the faithful and loving performance of filial offices, however far they extend beyond legal duty, nor can the affection and good will which comes unsought in return for such kindness be classed as improper or undue.—Hamlett v. duress, fraud, threats, importunity, or any other species of mental, moral, or physical coercion.[15] The means employed, the extent or degree of the influence, and by whom it is exerted, are all immaterial,[16] for the question to be determined is always: "Was the influence, whether slight or powerful, sufficient to destroy free agency, so that the act put in judgment was the result of the domination of the mind of another rather than the expression of the will and mind of the actor?"[17] It has been said that, whatever may be the particular form, in all cases of undue influence three factors are implied: (1) A person who can be influenced. (2) The fact of improper influence exerted. (3) Submission to the overmastering effect of such unlawful conduct.[18] The term "undue influence" has been variously de-

Moral turpitude or improper motive not necessary

(1) To constitute undue influence it is not necessarily required that there should exist moral turpitude or even an improper motive; but if one person, even from the best of motives, having obtained a dominant influence over the mind of another, thereby induces him to execute a deed or other instrument materially affecting his rights, which he would not have made otherwise, exercising the influence obtained to such an extent that the mind and will of the grantor is effaced or supplanted in the transaction so that the instrument, while professing to be the act and deed of the grantor, in fact and truth only expresses the mind and will of the person who procured the result, such an instrument so obtained is not improperly termed fraudulent as the result of "undue influence."—Myatt v. Myatt, 62 S.E. 887, 888, 149 N.C. 137.

(2) Motives of almost every conceivable kind may be offered, and if the mind of the agent, free to adopt or reject the motives, yields its assent, the act is the act of the agent. —Pressley v. Kemp, 16 S.C. 334, 344, 42 Am.R. 635—Means v. Means, 36 S. C.L. 167, 192.

Coercion the essential characteristic

(1) "Coercion is at all times the essence of undue influence."—In re Caffrey's Will, 159 N.Y.S. 99, 102, 95 Misc. 466.

(2) "To define coercion is really the crux of the accepted definition of undue influence. . . . 'Coercion' as used . . . in the definition of undue influence, need not be induced by actual or physical force. It may be the result of any wrongful means which produce moral restraint and consequent want of free will. Such means in law constitute the moral coercion of the definition."—Matter of Van Ness, 139 N.Y.S. 485, 492, 78 Misc. 592.

(3) "Undue influence is a kind of mental coercion, which destroys the free agency of one and constrains him to do that, which is against his will, and what he would not have done if left to his own judgment and volition, so that his act becomes the act of the one exerting the influence, rather than his own act—such act being one to his own injury, or to the injury of someone upon whom he would, if left to his own free will, have bestowed a benefit."—Beard v. Beard, 190 S.W. 703, 706, 173 Ky. 131, Ann.Cas.1918C 832.

(4) "Undue influence may be established without showing any physical coercion or constraint. The influence that vitiates may be subtle and be entirely without outward demonstration, but in whatever form it may appear it must, nevertheless, be made to appear from competent evidence that the will of the one accused of practicing undue influence dominated the will of the person whose act is brought in judgment.—Anderson v. Anderson, 134 P. 553, 557, 43 Utah 26.

(5) It does not imply the use of physical coercion or force. Any influence, however exercised, which destroys free agency, and substitutes the will of another for that of the person in whose name the act brought in judgment is done, is undue, or wrongful.—Dingman v. Romine, 42 S.W. 1087, 1088, 141 Mo. 466. "Coercion" defined see 14 C.J.S. p 1307.

Test similarly stated

(1) "The influence exercised by one person over another which the law would regard as undue and illegal must be of such a character as to destroy the free agency of the party who disposes of his property; but no matter how slight the influence may be, if the free agency of the party is destroyed, it destroys also the act or acts which come from it—which are the result of it."—Watson v. Holmes, 140 N.Y.S. 727, 733, 80 Misc. 48.

(2) "Influence, to be undue, must be such as, in effect, destroys the free agency of the person acted upon and substitutes the will of another for his own."—Hult v. Home Life Ins. Co. of New York, 240 N.W. 218, 224, 213 Iowa 890.

(3) The test of undue influence is whether the person exercised his or her own free agency and acted voluntarily by the use of his or her own reason and judgment.—Homewood v. Eggers, 295 P. 681, 684, 132 Kan. 256.

18. Mass.—Neill v. Brackett, 126 N. E. 93, 94, 234 Mass. 367.

One or another element emphasized

(1) There can be no fatally undue influence without a person incapable of protecting himself as well as a wrongdoer to be resisted.—Latham v. Udell, 33 Mich. 238, 242.

(2) Influence, in a legal sense, is undue only when it introduces a transaction which injures some one materially, or which is intrinsically unfair or unconscientious.—Gathings v. Howard, 84 So. 240, 246, 132 Miss. 355.

(3) To constitute "undue influence," the mind must be so controlled or affected by persuasion or pressure, artful or fraudulent contrivances, or by the insidious influences of persons in close confidential relations with him, that he is not left to act intelligently, understandingly, and voluntarily, but subject to the will or purpose of another.—Peacock v. Du Bois, 105 So. 321, 322, 90 Fla. 162.

(4) One party to the negotiations must occupy a superior position with fined,[19] as a coercion produced by importunity, or by a silent irresistible power, which the strong will often exercises over the weak and infirm, and which cannot be resisted, so that the motive is tantamount to force or fear;[20] an influence which acts to the injury of the person who is swayed by it, or of those whom he would, if left to himself, have benefited;[21] any improper or wrongful constraint, machination, or urgency of persuasion whereby the will of a person is overpowered and he is induced to do an act which he would not do, or to forbear from an act which he would do, if left to act freely;[22] a wrongful influence;[23] and so, despite the variety of the definitions, all the cases seem to agree that the dominant feature or controlling element of "undue influence" is that it deprives one of freedom of action, destroys free will, or precludes the exercise of free choice, discretion, or judgment,[24] as indicated by the statements set out in the note.[25]

It has been said that "undue influence" may be caused by duress,[26] that it partakes of the nature of duress;[27] and that it may be equivalent to, or reference to the other by reason of a real or apparent authority over him arising out of preexisting relations, or assumed at the time because of the weakness of mind, or distress or necessities of the other, by reason of which he knowingly gains an unconscionable advantage. —Emerson-Brantingham Implement Co. v. Anderson, 194 P. 160, 165, 58 Mont. 617.

(5) Undue influence exists wherever through weakness and dependence or implicit reliance by one on the good faith of another, the latter obtains an ascendancy which prevents the former from exercising an unbiased judgment.—Caven v. Agnew, 40 A. 480, 186 Pa. 314, 328—In re Douglass' Estate, 29 A. 715, 716, 162 Pa. 567.

As a Verb

To be influential; to exert an influence.[33] In the common acceptation of the term, the verb "influence" means to affect, alter, move, or sway;[34] and, more specifically, to affect, modify, or act upon physically, especially in some gentle, subtle, or gradual way, as the brain influences the mind; to exert or maintain a mental or moral power upon or over; to affect or sway by motives, as the feelings or conduct; also to exert influence upon, particularly to alter or move with respect to character, conduct, or the like; to affect, to persuade, to sway, as to influence a person for good; to affect, that is, to have an effect on the condition or development of; to modify or determine, as temperature influences flora and fauna;[35] to procure from, or to put some external constraint upon;[36] to use one's endeavors, although unable to carry his point.[37]

It has been held synonymous with "affect" see 2 C.J.S. p 918 note 67.1 in Pocket Parts, and "induce" see 42 C.J.S. p 1370 note 44; and has been compared with, or distinguished from, "induce" see 42 C.J.S. p 1370 note 46, and "procure."[38]

"Undue influence" and "want of mental capacity" have no necessary relation to each other. While it may be conceded that one who has no mind to be influenced cannot be subjected to undue influence, yet one who has a feeble mind, a defective will, a confused intelligence, and a deficient understanding, may be highly susceptible to influence, due or undue.—Hoff v. INGROSSING. The act of making a fair and perfect copy of any document from a rough draft of it, in order that it may be executed or put to its final purpose.[20]

INGUINAL. Of or pertaining to, or in the region of, the inguen, or groin.[21]

INHABIL. In Spanish law, incapacitated.[22]

INHABIT. A word derived from the Latin verb "habito."[23] It has been many times defined by the courts, and has been given different shades of meaning.[24] It has been defined as meaning to live or dwell in;[25] to occupy as a place of settled residence.[26] One of the necessary elements in the signification of the word is locality of existence.[27]

"Inhabit" is said to be usually classed as synonymous with "dwell" see 28 C.J.S. p 599 note 67, and "reside," but not, in strictness, properly so.[28]

Inhabited. Having inhabitants,[29] as in the phrase "inhabited territory," which has been construed in annexation statutes as including particular territory, regarded as a unit, even though a number of the parcels of land therein are uninhabited,[30] but as inapplicable to a tract of land which, regarded as a unit, is wholly without inhabitants.[31]

In General

It has been variously stated that the term "inhabitant" is derived from the Latin words "habeo,"[33] "habitare,"[34] or "habito."[35] Being a word of great variation of meaning,[36] it has many significations,[37] so that no exact definition can be given of the word "inhabitant" as applicable to all cases;[38] and its construction is generally governed by the connection in which it is used,[39] for, by itself, it has no definite meaning.[40] The term, however, has been conceived to be entirely free from technicality, and declared to have a known and universally accepted meaning, all agreeing in considering inhabitant as directly connected with habitation and abode.[41]

As shown in the following subdivisions, the term, under particular circumstances, may imply, or be used to refer to, citizenship, domicile, or permanent residence; and may sometimes be used with a corporate signification.

In its general sense, however, it has been variously defined as meaning a dweller or a dweller in a place;[42] a dweller or householder in any place;[43] the householder in a vill;[44] one domiciled;[45] one who has an actual residence in a place, or one who resides in a place;[46] one who lives in a place;[47] a resident.[48] In its broadest sense, the term "inhabitant" would include all sexes, ages, and conditions;[49] and in the following notes examples are given of what, under particular circumstances, the term has been held to include[50] and not to include.[51]

Corporation as an inhabitant see Corporations § 8 b; and number of inhabitants as affecting creation and alteration of school districts see the C.J.S. title Schools and School Districts § 33, also 56 C.J. p 210 note 2–p 211 note 14. Indicating Permanency

In law, the term "inhabitant" is used technically with varying meaning in respect of permanency of abode,[52] or as implying a permanent abode.[53] It embraces locality of existence[54] or fixed permanent home, and excludes the idea of a temporary residence.[55] All lexicographers distinguish an inhabitant as one who dwells in a place with the inten-

Permanency essential
(1) "One who has an actual, but merely temporary residence in a place, is not, in any proper sense, an inhabitant of that place. An inhabitant of a township or ward is one who has his domicile there, his fixed habitation and home, from which he has no present intention of removing."—Sharp v. Casper, 36 N.J.Law 367, 368.

tion of making it his home, and not a mere transient or temporary sojourner therein,[56] and in this connection the word has been defined as a dweller or resident in a place, in opposition to a mere sojourner or transient person;[57] one who dwells or resides permanently in a place, or who has a fixed residence, as distinguished from an occasional or transient lodger or visitor;[58] one who dwells or resides permanently, or who has a fixed and permanent abode, in a place;[59] one who has an actual fixed residence in a place;[60] one who is an established or permanent resident of a particular place;[61] one who lives in a place, and has there a fixed and legal settlement;[62] a permanent resident.[63] An examination of the authorities, however, shows that it frequently has a much broader meaning than this,[64] as indicated above in the first subdivision; and the word "inhabitant" has sometimes been given various meanings not inconsistent with the idea of prolonged absence from a particular locality.[65]

With Reference to Citizenship

While as stated in Citizens § 1 notes 34–40, the word "citizen" is not a convertible term with "inhabitant," although the two may sometimes be used synonymously, "inhabitant" does not necessarily imply citizenship,[66] for to be an inhabitant does not imply the relation of the person to the common-

Absence as affecting

Actual residence, that is, personal presence in a place, is one circumstance to determine the fact of being an inhabitant; but it is far from being conclusive. A seaman on a long voyage, and a soldier in actual service, may be respectively inhabitants of a place, though not personally present there for years. It depends, therefore, upon many other considerations, besides actual presence. Where an old resident and inhabitant, having a domicil from his birth in a particular place, goes to another place or country, the great question whether he has ceased to be an inhabitant of one place and become an inhabitant of another, will depend mainly on the question whether the new residence is temporary or permanent; whether it is occasional, for the purpose of a visit, or of accomplishing a temporary object; or whether it is for the purpose of continued residence and abode, until some new resolution be taken to remove. If the departure from one's fixed and settled abode is for a purpose in its nature temporary, whether it be business or pleasure, accompanied with an intent of returning and resuming the former place of abode as soon as such purpose is accomplished; in general, such a person continues to be an inhabitant at such place of abode, for all purposes of enjoying civil and political privileges, and of being subject to civil duties.—Sears v. Boston, 1 Metc., Mass., 250, 251.

wealth, but refers primarily to his abode or residence;[67] and this is not only an obvious distinction, but one which constitutional provisions often make,[68] as in the qualification of voters where both citizenship and residence are required, see Elections §§ 18, 19.

With Reference to Domicile

Consistent with the elements of "domicile" as defined and discussed in Domicile §§ 1-11, the word, "inhabitant," when used as indicative of, or as relating to, domicile, has been said to embrace the fact of residence at a place, with intent to regard it and make it one's home.[69] The act and intent must concur, and the intent may be inferred from declarations and conduct.[70] In this connection the term has been defined as meaning a person coming into a place with an intention to establish his domicile or permanent residence;[71] a person with a fixed domicile or legal residence;[72] one who has his domicile in a place;[73] one who resides actually and permanently in a given place and has his domicile there.[74] While the word "inhabitant" in its general acceptation may be synonymous with "domicile," see infra note 84, "inhabitant" may not only import "domicile," but something more than "domicile."[75]

Collective Significance

The word "inhabitants" is sometimes recognized as having a collective, or a corporate, rather than an individual, significance, with reference to governmental or municipal subdivisions.[76] The use of the words "inhabitants of the town" or "inhabitants of the school district," to signify the town or the school district itself in its capacity as a municipal corporation, or an organized entity, is frequent and its propriety unquestioned.[77]

synonymous,[80] since "inhabitant" implies a more fixed and permanent abode than "resident" and frequently imports many privileges which a mere resident cannot claim and many duties to which he is not subject;[81] and in some constitutional and statutory provisions "resident" may have a somewhat broader significance than "inhabitant," designating a class of persons who have no actual domicile within the state.[82]

Other terms. "Inhabitant" is sometimes used synonymously with "citizen," but not necessarily so see Citizens § 1 a notes 35–42. In its general acceptation, it may be equivalent to, or synonymous with, "citizen of a state,"[83] "domicile,"[84] "domiciliary resident,"[85] "legal residence,"[86] "legal voter,"[87] and "persons resident;"[88] and with reference to nations it has been said that "inhabitants," "people," and "subjects" are sometimes used indiscriminately as synonyms.[89] The term "inhabitant" has been contrasted with, or distinguished from, "elector" see Elections § 1 g note 91, "sojourner,"[90] "transient,"[91] "usual resident,"[92] and "voter" see Elections § 1 h note 16.

Imports scientific fitness
In passing upon the validity of a statute affecting the procedure in constitutional courts, it was said: "When we are examining a body of systematic law in order to determine whether certain characteristics are substantial or merely accidental, we use language according to the subject matter. In such a connection, the words 'organic,' 'inherent,' 'essential,' and the like, do not import a physical, moral, or mathemati-

"Inherent" has been said to be a word of the same class as, or synonymous with, "essential" see 30 C.J.S. p 1228 note 59, "intrinsic,"[1] and "organic;"[2] and has been compared with, or distinguished from, "inalienable" see 42 C.J.S. p 497 note 20, and "restrainable."[3]

"Inherent power." An authority possessed without its being derived from another; a right, ability, or faculty of doing a thing without receiving that right, ability, or faculty from another.[4]

Inherent powers of particular entities see such C.J.S. titles as Corporations §§ 186 a, 944; Courts §§ 31, 86–88; Municipal Corporations § 117, also 43 C.J. p 191 note 32–p 192 note 51; States § 26, also 59 C.J. p 75 notes 25–36; and United States §§ 4, 5, also 65 C.J. p 1254 note 52–p 1255 note 80.

Other phrases employing the word are set out in the note.[5] Other phrases as to which more recent adjudications have not been found see 31 C.J. p 1197 note 57–p 1198 note 61.

INHERENTLY. The adverb of "inherent."[6]

INHERETRIX. The old term for "heiress."[7]

INHERIT. In its broad and more general sense, it has been defined as meaning to acquire from any source, to have imparted to or conferred upon, to receive by transmission in any way;[8] to come into possession of, to enjoy as a possession, to obtain, to possess, to receive.[9] It is often construed to mean to be possessed of, to have, to receive, to take.[10]

In law, as stated in Descent and Distribution § 1 d notes 69–80, the word has acquired a peculiar and invariable meaning;[11] it is a word of limitation,[12] although sometimes it is used, not as a word of limitation, but loosely in lieu of "take."[13] While in its strict sense as a word of limitation it denotes only the passing of real property by descent,[14] yet it is sometimes applied in a broader or more general sense to taking by will,[15] and is even frequently applied to personal property.[16]

The term has been held equivalent to, or synonymous with, "descend" see 26 C.J.S. p 984 note 28, "receive,"[17] and "take."[18] It has been compared with, or distinguished from, "hold"[19] and "take."[20]

Phrases employing the word are set out in the note.[21]

INHERITABLE. Capable of being inherited; transmissible or descendible from the ancestor to the heir by course of law; heritable.[22]

INHERITANCE. In general, acquisition, ownership, possession, possession or right of possession, permanent possession, also a possession received by gift or without purchase;[23] that which is or is to be inherited;[24] the property which is inherited.[25] It is sometimes used as a synonym of "estate;"[26] and has been distinguished from "income" see 42 C.J.S. p 535 note 39.

As used in law, in its technical sense, as a word of limitation, properly restricted to real property which descends by operation of law, although sometimes more broadly construed as including both real and personal property which passes either by descent or by will, see Descent and Distribution § 1 d notes 81–1.

Phrases employing the word are set out in the note.[27]

INHERITOR. An heir; one who inherits.[28] The word has been used merely in the sense of "taker."[29]

INHIBITER or INHIBITOR. Generally, one who, or that which, inhibits; specifically, in Scotch law, a person who takes out an inhibition, q. v., as against a wife or a debtor.[30]

The term is also used in the iron and steel industry to describe a material used in the metal pickling bath to prevent the acid from impairing the integrity of the metal, although it has been said that a better term would perhaps be "neutralizer."[31]

INHIBITION. In English law, the name of a writ which forbids a judge from further proceeding in a cause depending before him; it is in the nature of a prohibition.[32]

In Scotch law, a species of diligence or process by which a debtor is prohibited from contracting any debt which may become a burden on his heritable property, in competition with the creditor at whose instance the inhibition is taken out; and from granting any deed of alienation, etc., to the prejudice of the creditor. Also a writ in the sovereign's name, passing the signet, which prohibits all and sundry from having transactions with a wife or giving her credit.[33]

In the civil law, a prohibition which the law makes or a judge ordains against an individual.[34]

In ecclesiastical law, a writ issuing from a superior ecclesiastical court, forbidding an inferior judge to proceed further in a cause pending before him; also the command of a bishop or ecclesiastical judge that a clergyman shall cease from taking any duty.[35]

I. NATURE AND FORM OF REMEDY

§ 1. Definition and Nature in General

An injunction is a writ framed according to the circumstances of the case commanding an act which the court regards as essential to justice, or restraining an act which it esteems contrary to equity and good conscience.

An injunction is a writ framed according to the circumstances of the case commanding an act which the court regards as essential to justice, or restraining an act which it esteems contrary to equity and good conscience.[1] It is an equitable remedy,[2] and has been held the principal and the most important process issued by courts of equity.[3] The function or purpose of an injunction is to restrain action or interference of some kind,[4] to furnish preventive relief against irreparable mischief or injury,[5] or to preserve the status quo;[6] it is protection for the future and not punishment for past transactions, as discussed infra § 22 c.

As prerogative writ. The writ of injunction is not in itself a prerogative writ, but it is sometimes put to prerogative purposes, for example, when it is sued out in behalf of the sovereign or state in aid of the jurisdiction to enforce trusts and prevent public nuisances or to enjoin the abuse of trust powers.[7]

§ 2. Preliminary Injunction

An interlocutory or preliminary injunction is a provisional remedy granted before a hearing on the merits to preserve the subject in controversy in its then existing condition.

An interlocutory or preliminary injunction is a provisional remedy granted before a hearing on the merits, and its sole object is to preserve the subject in controversy in its then existing condition, and without determining any question of right, merely to prevent a further perpetration of wrong or the doing of any act whereby the right in controversy may be materially injured or endangered, until a full and deliberate investigation of the case is afforded to the party.[8] This is so whether the in-

(6) An "interlocutory injunction" is wholly provisional, preliminary, and preparatory, looks to a future and final hearing more deliberate, solemn, and complete than any theretofore had, and does not forestall result of such hearing, or settle what it shall be, although contemplating what it may be.—Parker v. West View Cemetery Ass'n, 24 S.E.2d 29, 195 Ga. 237.

A temporary injunction has served its purpose when, after a trial on the merits, a permanent injunction is issued.—Shahen v. Superior Court of San Bernardino County, 115 P.2d 516, 46 Cal.App.2d 187.

Synonymous terms

(1) Terms "temporary injunction," "preliminary injunction," and "interlocutory injunction" mean the same thing.—Panhandle Const. Co. v. Plain, Tex.Civ.App., 52 S.W.2d 504.

(2) Temporary injunctions, which are also called interlocutory injunctions, preliminary injunctions, and even permanent injunctions as distinguished from perpetual injunctions, operate, unless dissolved by a further order, until final judgment.—Mickle v. Garrett, Tex.Civ.App., 110 S.W.2d 1235.

(3) An "injunction ad interim" is part of equity police and a device to keep parties in order and prevent one from hurting the other while their respective rights are under adjudication.—Parker v. West View Cemetery Ass'n, 24 S.E.2d 29, 195 Ga. 237.

Name immaterial

If a restraint imposed by order of court is "until the further order of the court" it is a "preliminary injunction" regardless of what the order is called by the court issuing it.—Gray v. Bybee, Cal.App., 141 P.2d 32—Lincoln v. Superior Court of Madera County, 124 P.2d 179, 51 Cal. App.2d 61.

Distinguished from perpetual injunction

A clear legal distinction exists between an "order" granting injunctive relief and a "judgment" granting a perpetual injunction, the former being merely interlocutory preserving status quo or protecting rights of litigants pending decision on the merits, and the latter being a final adjudication of rights of parties subject only to right of appeal, pending which full protection to rights of party affected by permanent injunction is secured by right to supersede.—Allen v. Gulf Oil Corporation, Tex. Civ.App., 139 S.W.2d 207, error refused.

junction is prohibitory or mandatory.[9] Distinguishing characteristics of injunctions of this class are that they do not conclude the rights of the parties, and that their issuance is not dependent on a hearing on the merits.[10]

§ 3. Perpetual Injunction

A permanent or perpetual injunction is one granted by the judgment which finally disposes of the injunction suit.

A perpetual or permanent injunction is one granted by the judgment which finally disposes of the injunction suit.[11] It forms a part of the judgment on a hearing on the merits,[12] and it can properly be ordered only on the final judgment.[13] Injunctions of this class are in no sense provisional remedies but are always, and must be, final relief.[14]

In order to grant relief on the merits of the case by perpetual injunction it is not a prerequisite that a temporary injunction should have been applied for and granted, as discussed infra § 213.

§ 4. Preventive or Prohibitive or Prohibitory Injunction

A prohibitive or preventive injunction commands a person to refrain from doing an act and necessarily operates on unperformed acts and prevents a threatened but nonexistent injury.

An injunction may compel a person to do as well as to refrain from doing,[15] and injunctions are mandatory or preventive according as they command defendant to do, or to refrain from doing, a particular thing.[16] A preventive or prohibitive or prohibitory injunction commands a person to refrain from doing an act.[17] Injunctions of this character necessarily operate on unperformed and unexecuted acts and prevent a threatened but nonexistent injury,[18] and they cannot be used to redress a consummated wrong or to undo what has been done.[19] A concrete case is presented whenever a right of the plaintiff is threatened by the defendant, and the damage would be irreparable, and where protection of that right belongs to the class of cases that are cognizable in equity.[20]

Nature

§ 5. Mandatory Injunction

a. In general
b. Preliminary mandatory injunctions

a. In General

A mandatory injunction is an extraordinary remedial process which commands the performance of some positive act, and it is well settled that courts of equity have jurisdiction in proper cases to compel the performance of an act as well as to restrain it.

A mandatory injunction is an extraordinary remedial process[21] resorted to usually for the purpose of effectuating full and complete justice,[22] and commands the performance of some positive act.[23] While it has been said that the granting of mandatory injunctions is governed by the same rules as the granting of preventive injunctions,[24] courts are more reluctant to grant a mandatory injunction than a prohibitory one,[25] and generally an injunction will not lie except in prohibitory form.[26] In a very great majority of cases injunction is a merely preventive remedy, and in some cases courts have on this ground refused to issue an injunction mandatory in its nature, or have broadly declared that it is not the object of an injunction to redress a consummated wrong or to undo what has been done.[27]

Nevertheless, since the purpose of mandatory injunctions is not to correct a wrong of the past, in the sense of redress for injury already sustained, but to prevent further injury,[28] except in jurisdictions where the practice is governed by special statutory provisions,[29] a court of equity is not always limited to the restraint of a contemplated or threat-

Determination of character

(1) For the purpose of determining whether the effect of an injunction is mandatory or prohibitory, the result of the enforcement of the writ on defendant must be considered; and if it compels him affirmatively to surrender a position which he holds, and which, on facts alleged by him, he is entitled to hold, it is mandatory.—Growers Warehousing Corp. v. W. E. Sawyer Tobacco Co., 5 Tenn.App. 619.

(2) Order of court effective to transfer possession of property from defendants to plaintiff, and restrain defendants from interfering with plaintiff's use thereof in fulfillment of alleged contract until further order of court, is a mandatory injunction.—Walbridge-Aldinger Co. v. City of Tulsa, 233 P. 171, 107 Okl. 259.

(3) An injunction is mandatory if it has effect of compelling performance of a substantive act and necessarily contemplates change in relative position or rights of parties at time the injunction is granted or the decree entered.—Pomin v. Superior Court in and for El Dorado County, 112 P.2d 17, 44 Cal.App.2d 206.

(4) An injunction, requiring person to cease selling, or suffering to be sold, on his premises intoxicating beverages for other than specified purposes, without requiring any affirmative act on his part, is "prohibitory injunction," not "mandatory injunction," as mere passiveness on such person's part will remedy condition complained of.—Sorrentino v. Cunningham, 39 N.E.2d 473, 111 Ind. App. 212.

32 C.J. p 22 note 24.

Applicable to final decrees

The statute declaring that an injunction may only restrain and may not compel a party to perform an act does not limit inhibition to the granting of an interlocutory injunction, but is applicable to final decrees and to rulings on demurrer.—Campbell v. Deal, 195 S.E. 432, 185 Ga. 474.

Requiring incidental affirmative action

(1) Where main purpose of an injunction is not to require any affirmative action, but to restrain defendant from repeating a trespass, injunction is not mandatory although compliance therewith may require some affirmative action on part of party enjoined.—Manry v. First Nat. Bank of Barnesville, 23 S.E.2d 662, 195 Ga. 163—Denson v. Tarver, 197 S.E. 242, 186 Ga. 180—Noland v. Biggers, 156 S.E. 266, 171 Ga. 627—Rosser v. Styron, 155 S.E. 23, 171 Ga. 238—32 C.J. p 22 note 24 [b] (8).

(2) Injunction against continuing trespass by servant on master's premises is not objectionable as mandatory although restraining servant from remaining on premises.—Killian v. Cherokee County, 150 S.E. 158, 169 Ga. 313.

ened action;[30] and it is settled beyond question that equity has jurisdiction in a proper case to compel affirmative performance of an act as well as to restrain it,[31] and that it is its duty to do so,[32] especially where it is the only remedy which will meet the requirements of the case.[33]

A mandatory injunction may be granted although the act causing the injury has been completed before the suit is brought and complainant may by this means be put in statu quo,[34] and where defendant

(3) When main purpose of injunction is to restrain diversion of water from natural channel causing overflow, injunction is not mandatory and contrary to statute, although requiring some affirmative action such as opening of hole in wall to permit water to flow.—Spencer v. Tumlin, 116 S.E. 600, 155 Ga. 341.

(4) Where main purpose of injunction is to restrain repeated trespass, injunction is not mandatory, although compliance with it requires affirmative action by party enjoined, such as removal of fence across roadway to cemetery.—Phinizy v. Gardner, 125 S.E. 195, 159 Ga. 136.

Injunctions held mandatory

(1) The rule against allowance of mandatory injunctions could not be evaded by enjoining a creditor holding a personal judgment based on an indebtedness secured by a deed to realty from adding interest thereon until security was levied on and sold.—Shedden v. National Florence Crittenton Mission, 12 S.E.2d 618, 191 Ga. 428.

(2) Interlocutory injunction, which, if enforced, would dispossess defendant and admit plaintiff into possession of controverted premises, was in legal effect mandatory injunction, and relief afforded thereby not within scope of writ.—Bond v. Harrison, 168 S.E. 604, 176 Ga. 568—Beck v. Kah, 136 S.E. 160, 163 Ga. 365—Burns v. Hale, 133 S.E. 857, 162 Ga. 336.

(3) Other injunctions see 32 C.J. p 22 note 24 [b].

In Idaho

(1) It was held in a case citing Corpus Juris that, since a preliminary mandatory injunction is granted only in extreme cases where the right is very clear and it appears that irreparable injury will flow from its refusal, it was unnecessary to determine whether a statute providing that an injunction is a writ or order requiring a person to refrain from a particular act and a case construing such statute forbid a mandatory injunction.—Evans v. District Court of Fifth Judicial Dist., 275 P. 99, 100, 47 Idaho 267.

(2) Under the statute, "an injunction is a writ or order requiring a person to refrain from a particular act . . . and not a writ or order requiring a person to do a certain act."—Brinton v. Steele, 112 P. 319, 19 Idaho 71—Wilson v. Boise City, 60 P. 84, 7 Idaho 69, 74.

Statutory power

The exercise of jurisdiction, expressly conferred by statute, to give equitable relief by compelling affirmative action, is not limited to usual situation in which, apart from statute, mandatory injunction may be issued, as where defendant is guilty of continuing wrong on plaintiff and termination of wrongful conduct involves restoration of conditions existing before it began.—Department of Public Utilities v. Trustees of Properties of New York, N H. & H. R. Co., 24 N.E.2d 647, 304 Mass. 664.

Compelling court to decide

Since a mandatory injunction to compel a judge to act is equivalent to mandamus and the same rules apply, as discussed infra § 9, where a court found that defendant had not been discharged in bankruptcy in the federal court as alleged a mandatory injunction would not lie to compel the court to decide that defendant had been discharged—Hargis v. has fully completed the act sought to be restrained, after the filing of the bill but before the issuance of any order or decree, the court has power to compel by mandatory injunction the restoration of the former condition of things,[35] and thereby prevent the gaining of an advantage by reason of the wrongful act.[36] Where defendant does an act which the bill seeks to enjoin, he acts at his peril and is subject to the power of the court to compel a restoration of the status quo,[37] or to grant such other relief as may be proper under the particular circumstances of the case.[38] Also a mandatory injunction may issue in the enforcement of a judgment or decree;[39] or as an auxiliary to a prohibitory injunction.[40]

However, even if the right is clear, it does not follow that a mandatory injunction must be granted,[41] and such injunctions will be issued only in cases of extreme[42] necessity,[43] where the right invaded is material and substantial,[44] and where adequate redress at law is not afforded.[45] Mandatory injunctions will never be granted unless extreme or very serious damage at least will ensue from withholding that relief;[46] nor will they be issued in doubtful cases,[47] where they would promote, and not remedy, a wrong,[48] where they would brush aside fixed rights for the benefit of a wrongdoer,[49] where they would operate inequitably or oppressively,[50] where the injury complained of is capable of compensation in damages,[51] where enforcement will require too great an amount of supervision by the court,[52] or where there has been unreasonable delay by the person seeking the injunction, as discussed infra § 171.

The right to a mandatory injunction to protect an easement is considered in Easements § 107 b (1) (f); as a remedy for violation of building restrictions infra § 87; to remove encroachments infra § 67; to compel corporate action infra § 101; or to recover possession of property infra § 60.

b. Preliminary Mandatory Injunctions

While a court of equity usually has power to award preliminary mandatory injunctions in a proper case, mandatory injunctions should rarely be granted except on final hearing.

In a number of decisions it is either said or held without qualification that a mandatory injunction will not be issued on an interlocutory application; that an injunction, unless issued after the decree, when it becomes a judicial process, can be used only for the purpose of prevention and protection,[53] and not for the purpose of compelling defendant to undo anything which he has previously done.[54] However, while it is generally true that the office of a preliminary injunction is to preserve the status quo until on final hearing the court may grant full relief as discussed supra § 2, and that this can be accomplished by an injunction prohibitory in form, it sometimes happens that the status quo is a condition not of rest but of action and the condition of rest is what will inflict the irreparable injury complained of, in which circumstances courts of equity may issue mandatory writs before the case is heard on its merits, as it may be the only effective remedy,[55] and, according to the weight of authority, a court of equity has power to award preliminary mandatory injunctions in extreme cases where the right is very clear,[56] and especially is this so where the acts complained of are willful or fraudulent and without any pretense of right.[57]

However, mandatory injunctions should rarely be granted except on final hearing[58] and then only to execute the judgment or decree of the court.[59] To authorize the issuance of a mandatory injunction on an interlocutory application, the situation must be unusual and the granting of relief essential to maintain the status quo;[60] the case must be one of extreme necessity;[61] the invasion of the right must be material and substantial;[62] the right of complainant must be clear and unmistakable on the law and the facts;[63] and there must exist an urgent and paramount necessity for the issuing of the writ in order to prevent extreme or other serious damage which would ensue from withholding it.[64] If the issuance on preliminary application of an injunction mandatory in nature will have the effect of granting to the complainant all the relief that he could obtain on a final hearing, the application should be refused except in very rare cases, and then only where complainant's right to the relief is clear and certain.[65]

§ 6. Common and Special Injunctions

An almost obsolete classification of interlocutory injunctions is that which divides them into "common injunctions" and "special injunctions."

As shown infra this section, an old but now almost, if not entirely, obsolete classification of interlocutory injunctions is that which divides them into "common injunctions" and "special injunctions."

Common injunctions issued secondarily and in aid of another equity,[66] the object being to restrain further proceedings in an action at law to enable defendant therein to assert an equity which he could not assert in a court of law.[67] Where plaintiff in the action at law failed to answer or delayed in answering the bill, the injunction issued as of course,[68] but it did not issue until such failure to answer, and then only as a means of compelling appearance and full answer.[69] The effect of the common injunction on a pending suit at law was determined by the progress of that suit at the date of its issuance.[70] Where the common injunction issued before the declaration in the action at law it stayed all further proceedings; but if it issued afterward it merely stayed the execution.[71] A common injunction usually was dissolved as a matter of course on the coming in of an answer denying the merits, and without any inquiry into the truth of the allegations, unless some special reason was alleged for continuing it.[72] Under the practice in those states in which both legal and equitable causes are tried in the same courts and in the same forms of action, it would seem that the necessity for a common injunction can never arise,[73] and in fact common injunctions no longer issue in most jurisdictions,[74] such result following as of course from statutes requiring notice to the opposing party before the issuance of an injunction;[75] and the terms "preliminary" and "special" injunctions are in some cases employed interchangeably.[76]

A special injunction was founded, not on the equity existing in the controversy at law between the parties, but on something collateral to it, as, for instance, the necessity of protecting the property in dispute pending the litigation, and was granted only on special application,[77] on good cause shown by affidavit,[78] and on special grounds arising out of the circumstances of the case,[79] and operated according to the terms of the order granting it.[80] Usually it was granted only on notice.[81] The practice in dissolving special injunctions differed from that in the dissolution of common injunctions.[82] In the case of special injunctions the bill might be read as an affidavit to contradict the answer where there was any conflict and the injury to plaintiff would be irreparable if the relief were not granted; but the injunction would not in general be dissolved on motion, but would be continued to the hearing to enable the parties to support by proofs their respective allegations.[83] To dissolve a special injunction before hearing the cause on proof, it devolved on defendant to show that plaintiff had no cause fit to be heard;[84] and if from the answer it appeared that

§ 7. Cross Injunctions

Where one person obtains an injunction restraining another from interfering with certain property or disposing of it, and the person thus enjoined appears to be equally entitled to possession of the property, he may obtain a like injunction against the other party.

Where one person obtains an injunction restraining another from interference with, or disposition of, certain property, and the person thus enjoined appears to be equally entitled to the possession of this property, he may, on application, obtain a like injunction against the other party without any proof of insolvency or other special cause for depriving him of control.[86]

§ 8. Restraining Order

A restraining order is an order granted to maintain the subject of controversy in statu quo until the hearing of an application for a temporary injunction, and, while the term has been held synonymous with "injunction," it has also been distinguished therefrom.

A restraining order is an order granted to maintain the subject of controversy in statu quo until the hearing of an application for a temporary injunction.[87] Its purpose is merely to suspend proceedings until there may be an opportunity to inquire whether any injunction should be granted,[88] and it is not intended to operate as an injunction pendente lite,[89] and should not in effect determine the issues involved before the parties can have their day in court[90] or give an advantage to either party by proceedings in the acquisition or alteration of the property the right to which is disputed while the hands of the other party are tied.[91] A restraining order, like a temporary injunction, is provisional in its nature and does not conclude a right, but is simply incidental to the main issue to be tried.[92] The unauthorized issuance of a restraining order will not prevent the issuance of a temporary injunction on a full hearing.[93]

In some jurisdictions restraining orders are not recognized,[94] and, where the right to grant injunctional relief is strictly statutory, a defendant is not entitled to a restraining order against plaintiff, where the statute makes no provision therefor.[95]

"Injunction" distinguished. Although the term, "restraining order," is sometimes used as a synonym of "injunction,"[96] and a restraining order has been held in effect an injunction,[97] it has also been distinguished therefrom.[98] Whether an order is a restraining order or a temporary injunction must be determined from its form and substance.[99] The restraint which the order purports to impose and not the name given to it determines its true name and character.[1] The fact that a bond is required by the court and given by the party applying for a restraining order will not change it to a temporary injunction.[2]

Injunction for short time only

Although "temporary restraining order" usually expires at a definite date and a "temporary injunction" is effective until final hearing on the merits, the two terms are often used synonymously to denote an injunction for a short time only.—Speed v. Orders held to be restraining orders

(1) An order restraining defendant from prosecuting action in another state specifically providing the restraint should be effective only until further order of court and which also fixed date of hearing on temporary injunction was a "restraining order" and not a "temporary injunction."—Allen v. Glitten, 134 P.2d 631, 156 Kan. 550.

(2) Fiat, indorsed injunction petition to restrain construction of underpass by railroad, reciting that temporary injunction was granted, and commanding defendant's appearance at judge's office four days after issuance of order to show cause and that injunction should cease on day of hearing unless extended by order, held to order issuance of mere "restraining order" which would be dissolved by judgment at final hearing.—Shelton v. City of Abilene, Tex.Civ. App., 75 S.W.2d 934.

(3) Other orders.—Ex parte Rains, 257 S.W. 217, 113 Tex. 428.

Orders held to be injunctions

(1) Order, made some six weeks after institution of action, restraining influence of which was to continue until determination of suit was held a preliminary injunction as distinguished from a restraining order.—Yellen v. Fidelity & Casualty Co. of New York, 1 P.2d 1019, 115 Cal. App. 434.

(2) Restraining order which made no provision for hearing and did not limit its effect as to time was held a "temporary injunction."—Dyer v. Dyer, Tex.Civ.App., 87 S.W.2d 489.

Purported extension

Temporary injunction not fixing day for its expiration held not changed to temporary restraining order by purported ten-day extension from specified date.—Terrell v. Alpha Petroleum Co., Tex.Civ.App., 54 S.W. 2d 821, affirmed Alpha Petroleum Co. v. Continuance of hearing on temporary injunction from time provided in restraining order is not sufficient to convert restraining order into injunction.—Harbin v. Love, 227 N.W. 145, 119 Neb. 76.

Entire scope, purpose, and effect of an order must be considered in order to determine whether it is a temporary restraining order or an injunction.—Walbridge-Aldinger Co. v. City of Tulsa, 233 P. 171, 107 Okl. 259.

Where a restraining order has terminated as a matter of law, the belief of the parties and the judge to the contrary will not change it.[15] Where the order refusing the injunction is appealed from, the restraining order is not prolonged, nor, where an injunction has been granted and dissolved, does an appeal from the order of dissolution revive the restraining order.[16] In case a restraining order is dissolved, a party is not entitled to have the order dissolving it superseded pending review.[17] Where a restraining order has been granted ex parte, it may be dissolved on motion before answer.[18]

If the hearing provided for in a restraining order, to show cause why such order should not be made permanent till further order of the court, was at any time passed in such manner as to continue in force such order, it would take an order or judgment, properly entered of record at the time or during the term, or thereafter by nunc pro tunc order, to effectuate that purpose.—Ex parte Rains, supra.

§ 9. Distinguished from Mandamus

While mandatory injunction has been held equivalent to mandamus and governed by like considerations, the terms "injunction" and "mandamus" are not interchangeable.

The terms "injunction" and "mandamus" are not interchangeable,[19] but present several well defined points of difference. Mandamus is strictly a legal remedy while the remedy of injunction is solely equitable and cognizable in no other forum than a court of equity.[20] Also mandamus is a remedy to compel action while injunction is a remedy to prevent action,[21] and while there are a limited number of cases in which the rule is apparently denied altogether,[22] or greatly limited,[23] it is very generally held that mandamus is not the proper remedy where the relator does not ask that defendant be compelled to do an act, but demands on the contrary that he be forbidden to do certain acts, and that mandamus cannot be made to perform the office of an injunction.[24] On the other hand, mandamus and not injunction ordinarily is the proper remedy where nothing is sought but the enforcement of a legal duty,[25] although under some circumstances a mandatory injunction will issue to compel the performance of a duty of this character if for any reason mandamus is not available,[26] and in some cases mandatory injunction has been held equivalent to mandamus and governed by like considerations.[27]

§ 10. Distinguished from Prohibition

Prohibition and injunction against proceedings at law are distinguished by the fact that an injunction is directed only to the parties litigant while a prohibition is directed to the court itself.

While prohibition is similar to the remedy by injunction against proceedings at law in that the object of the former, as well as of the latter, is the restraint of legal proceedings, the remedies are to be distinguished by the fact that an injunction is directed only to the parties litigant, without in any manner interfering with the court, while a prohibition is directed to the court itself, commanding it to cease from the exercise of a jurisdiction to which it has no legal claim.[28]

§ 11. Constitutional and Statutory Provisions in General

The right to injunction is not a constitutional right, but is one that is sometimes granted by statute and it may be enlarged or limited at the will of the legislature.

While the power of a court of equity to grant writs of injunction antedates specific legislative sanction and has been said not to be a statutory grant of power to a court, as discussed infra § 12, the issuance of injunctions, preventive or mandatory, is sometimes authorized by statute,[29] and where the right to an injunction is not a constitu-

Preserve or change status

Generally functions of injunction are to restrain motion and enforce inaction, thereby preserving matters in statu quo, while those of mandamus are to set in motion and compel action and object of such writ is to change status of affairs and substitute action for inactivity.—Department of Public Utilities v. Alike in essential respects

(1) A mandatory injunction is like a mandamus in all essential respects, although the latter is directed to a public officer to compel performance of an administrative act as to which he has no discretion.—McNulty v. National Mediation Board, D.C.N.Y., 18 F.Supp. 494.

Policy to extend remedy

tional right, but is one granted by statute, it may be enlarged or limited at the will of the legislature.[30] A remedial statute prescribing rules for the issuance of a preliminary injunction should be construed liberally.[31]

As order instead of writ. By the statutes of some of the states the writ of injunction has been abolished, and an injunction is merely an order rather than a writ.[32]

II. GENERAL PRINCIPLES GOVERNING ISSUANCE

§ 12. In General

The propriety of granting an injunction depends on the facts of each particular case and the general principles of equity as related to injunctions.

The grant or refusal of an injunction is a matter of equitable jurisdiction.[33] The power of a court of equity to grant writs of injunction antedates specific legislative sanction,[34] and ordinarily is not a statutory grant of power to a court.[35]

The propriety of granting an injunction depends on the facts of each particular case and the general principles of equity as related to injunctions,[36] and the right to exercise common sense in the granting or refusing of injunctions is one of the fundamental prerogatives of a court of chancery.[37] Since an injunction should not be made an instrument of oppression and injury,[38] it will not be granted when good conscience does not require it,[39] where it will operate oppressively or contrary to justice,[40] where it is not reasonable and equitable under the circumstances of the case,[41] or where it will tend to pro-

note, rather than to prevent, fraud and injustice.[42] An injunction will be granted to protect clear legal rights, but not to accomplish a wrong,[43] and the equities of the case must be in favor of the party seeking the injunctive relief.[44] However, injunction will lie if the court can by its decree assure the parties that its operative effect will be wholly without injustice or oppression to either party.[45]

§ 13. Actions and Proceedings in Aid of Which Injunction Authorized

Injunction may properly be granted in aid of other actions and proceedings.

An equity court has the right to use a writ of injunction as an auxiliary remedy,[46] and an injunction may properly be granted in aid of other actions or proceedings.[47] However, an injunction asked in a proceeding brought for other purposes must have some relation and be subsidiary to those purposes;[48] it is not proper in that proceeding to ask an injunction for some independent purpose.[49] An ancillary injunction action may be maintained to protect, but not to defeat, the jurisdiction of the body which has a matter under consideration,[50] but, in order to maintain such ancillary action pending the determination of a primary proceeding, there must exist a res which may be endangered by the acts sought to be enjoined.[51]

An injunction is not necessarily a mere incident to the enforcement of some other equitable right,[52] and an application for an injunction is not merely auxiliary to a proceeding at law where the entire and final remedy is sought in the equity court.[53]

§ 14. Discretion of Court

Injunctive relief is not a matter of right, but its grant or refusal usually rests in the sound discretion of the court, exercised in harmony with well established principles.

Except in cases where a statute gives an absolute right to an injunction,[54] an injunction, whether temporary or permanent, cannot as a general rule be sought as a matter of right, but the power to grant or refuse it rests in the sound discretion of the court under the circumstances and the facts of the particular case,[55] unless perhaps in cases where facts

Continuing trespass

Injunction is a proper remedy for relief against continuing trespass, when sought as an ancillary remedy in an action in which the title to land or the right to its possession is at issue.—Jackson v. Jernigan, 5 S.E. 2d 148, 216 N.C. 401.

Emergency Price Control Act providing that an injunction "shall be granted" on application of the price administrator against violation of price regulations does not mandatorily require issuance of an injunction against the violation of a price regulation merely because the administrator asks it, but the court may exercise discretion in determining what order shall be made.—U. S.—Hecht Co. v. Bowles, App.D.C., 64 S.Ct. 587, reversing, C.C.A., 137 F.2d 689, which reversed, D.C., Brown v. Hecht Co., 49 F.Supp. 528, certiorari granted Hecht Co. v. Brown, 64 S.Ct. 81.

Fair Labor Standards Act, giving the court jurisdiction for cause shown to restrain violations of the act, gives jurisdiction to grant, but does not require in every case the grant of, an injunction, and the granting of an injunction usually is in the discretion of the court.—Fleming v. Jacksonville Paper Co., C.C.A.Fla., 128 F.2d 395.

Purpose of statute

Purpose of statute relating to injunctions was to end abuse of their issuance ex parte and to provide for prompt hearing and issuance in sound discretion of trial court.—United Gas Public Service Co. v. Arkansas-Louisiana Pipe Line Co., 147 So. 66, 176 La. 1024.

Discretion of court in:

Continuing, dissolving, or vacating injunction see infra § 226.

Requiring bond see infra §§ 165, 166.

No discretion in final stay of action

Grant of temporary injunction is usually discretionary, but not decree allowing perpetual stay.—Colson v. Pelgram, 182 N.E. 19, 259 N.Y. 370, reversing 256 N.Y.S. 640, 235 App. Div. 137—Pond v. Harwood, 34 N.E. 768, 139 N.Y. 111.

Preserving court's jurisdiction

Trial court's discretion as to granting or refusing temporary injunction should ordinarily be exercised in favor of granting writ, where it is necessary to preserve court's jurisdiction or status quo.—First Trust Joint Stock Land Bank of Chicago v. Hayes, Tex.Civ.App., 90 S.W.2d 331.

Failure fully to disclose facts

An application for an injunction goes to the sound conscience of the court, acting on all the circumstances of each particular case; and the court, having the right to require a full and candid disclosure of all the facts, may refuse to exercise its extraordinary power by writ of injunction if the proceedings are such as to show that a full disclosure has not been made.—Western Maryland Dairy v. Chenowith, 23 A. 2d 660, 180 Md. 236—American-Stewart Distillery v. Stewart Distilling Co., 177 A. 473, 168 Md. 212—32 C.J. p 29 note 13 [b].

More inadequacy of a legal remedy will not necessarily require equity to exercise extraordinary power by injunction.

N.H.—Hatch v. Hillsgrove, 138 A. 428, 83 N.H. 91, reheard 139 A. 366, 83 N.H. 91.

Relief refused although right infringed

Chancellor has discretion to refuse injunction, where refusal is not arbitrary, even though there is infringement of a right, leaving plaintiff to action at law for redress of damages.—Christenson v. Nielsen, 54 P.2d 430, 88 Utah 336.

Absence of party

Exercise of discretion to refuse mandatory injunction may properly be influenced by absence from suit of party defendant having beneficial interest in resisting claim asserted by plaintiff.—Moor v. granting of the injunction depends on the determination of questions of fact and the evidence is conflicting.[59]

Nature of the discretion. This discretionary power, however, is not arbitrary and unlimited, but must be exercised reasonably and in harmony with well established principles.[60] In every case in which the law leaves anything to the discretion of the court, a sound and legal discretion is understood and not an arbitrary one.[61] A proper discretion does not include the misapplication of the law to conceded facts;[62] and the court must be guided by conclusions based on the law and facts disclosed by the particular case.[63] Where the case made out by the complainant is perfectly clear, and he has complied with all the requirements of the law for the issuance of an injunction, he is entitled to the injunction as a matter of right.[64] On the other hand, if the facts conclusively show that it would be inequitable and unjust to award an injunction, the court has no discretion in the matter but must refuse it.[65] A temporary injunction may be refused under circumstances where a permanent injunction might be granted,[66] particularly where sought on an ex parte application,[67] and the fact that the object of an action may be defeated by refusing a temporary injunction is not of itself sufficient to deprive the court of all discretionary power in the matter.[68]

The court which is to exercise the discretion is the trial court and not the appellate court.[69] The action of the court may be reviewed on appeal or error in case of a clear abuse of discretion, but not otherwise, as shown in Appeal and Error § 1591, and ordinarily mandamus will not lie to control such discretion, as discussed in the C.J.S. title Mandamus § 110, also 38 C.J. p 653 note 59–p 655 note 74.

§ 15. Caution Required

The power to issue injunctions should be exercised with great caution and only where the reason and necessity therefor are clearly established.

The power of the courts to issue injunctions should be exercised with great caution and only where the reason and necessity therefor are clearly established.[70] This rule has been applied more frequently in the cases of preliminary[71] and mandatory[72] injunctions, and to restraining orders.[73]

§ 16. Grounds for Granting or Denying Injunction in General

As a general rule, an injunction should issue only in cases specifically pointed out by law, or where irreparable injury to the personal or property rights of the individual will result unless protected by its restraining effect.

It has been stated broadly that an injunction should issue only in cases specifically pointed out by law, or where irreparable injury to the personal or property rights of the individual will result unless protected by its restraining effect.[74] While it has been held that a statute specifying the grounds for issuance of an injunction is controlling, regardless of what the rule may be in equity,[75] and that an injunction, as an independent remedy under statute, may be obtained in cases where such relief would have been granted in equity previous to the adoption of the statute,[76] it has also been said that injunction is granted only on equitable grounds,[77] and that the writ of injunction is not exercised indiscriminately notwithstanding a statute providing that it may be obtained as an independent remedy in an action by equity proceeding in all cases where such relief would have been granted in equity previous to the adoption of the statute.[78]

Various other matters considered by the court in determining the right to an injunction are considered infra §§ 18–33.

§ 17. —— Preliminary Injunction

A temporary injunction usually should be granted where the questions presented are grave and injury to the moving party will be certain, substantial, and irreparable if it is denied and the final determination is in his favor, while if it is granted and the decision is unfavorable the inconvenience and loss to the opposing party will be inconsiderable or may be adequately protected by a bond.

In the cases dealing with injunctions, there are various general expressions involving a combination of the principles, discussed specifically infra §§ 18–33, which justify or are necessary to warrant the issuance of a preliminary or interlocutory injunction.[79] Thus it has been said that a temporary injunction usually should be granted where the questions presented are grave and injury to the moving party will be certain, substantial, and irreparable if it is denied and the final determination is in his favor, while if it is granted and the decision is unfavorable the inconvenience and loss to the opposing party will be inconsiderable or may be adequately protected by a bond;[80] that the court will grant a preliminary injunction when it is made to appear that there is a substantial controversy between the parties and that one of them is committing an act or threatening the immediate commission of an act that will cause irreparable injury or destroy the status quo of the controversy before a full hearing can be had on the merits of the case;[81] that power to issue an injunction pendente lite is exercised whenever necessary to subserve the ends of justice;[82] that a preliminary injunction should not issue unless from the pressure of an urgent necessity;[83] or that a preliminary injunction should not be granted except to maintain the status quo or to prevent irreparable injury.[84]

A preliminary injunction may be granted by the court, without expressing, or without having the means of forming, a final opinion as to the rights of the parties,[85] and, while it has been held that a preliminary injunction should not be denied merely because a final hearing may be had promptly,[86] it has also been held that an injunction pendente lite will not be granted if an immediate trial is possible.[87] Where the issuance of a preliminary injunction would have the effect of granting all the relief that could be obtained by a final decree and would practically dispose of the whole case, ordinarily it will not be granted,[88] unless complainant's right to relief is clear.[89]

The status quo which will be preserved by a preliminary injunction is the last, actual, peaceable, noncontested status which preceded the pending controversy.[90]

Statutory regulation. Under statutes in some jurisdictions, an injunction pendente lite can be issued only in a pending action or special proceeding, or to enjoin a mortgage foreclosure by advertisement.[91]

§ 18. —— Absence of Precedent for Injunction Sought

It is not a fatal objection to the granting of an injunction that the use of the writ for the particular purpose for which it is sought is novel.

While it has been said that the writ of injunction will not be awarded in new and doubtful cases not coming within the well established principles of equity,[92] yet the absence of precedent, although not to be overlooked entirely, does not of itself determine questions of jurisdiction.[93] It is not a fatal objection that the use of the writ for the particular purpose for which it is sought is novel.[94] Courts may amplify remedies and apply rules and general principles for the advancement of substantial justice.[95] If this were not so, and courts were confined to particular precedents, there would be no power to grant relief in new cases constantly occurring.[96]

§ 19. Existence and Nature of Right Protected

a. In general
b. Nature of rights in general
c. Doubtful rights
d. Violation of right

a. In General

The existence of a right violated is a prerequisite to the granting of an injunction; an injunction will not issue to protect a right not in esse and which may never arise.

The existence of a right violated is a prerequisite to the granting of an injunction,[97] and, where it is clear that the complainant does not have the right that he claims, he is not entitled to an injunction, either temporary or perpetual, to prevent a violation of such supposed right.[98] This principle has been applied where complainant claims the right under a law that is unconstitutional[99] or which has been repealed,[1] or under a contract that is illegal.[2] An injunction will not issue to protect a right not in esse and which may never arise[3] or to restrain an act which does not give rise to a cause of ac-

b. Nature of Rights in General

While injunction will not be granted unless there is some substantial right to be protected, the question whether such relief will be granted to protect political rights or rights other than property rights frequently is dependent on the provisions of the statutes in the various jurisdictions.

While equitable, as well as legal, rights are entitled to the protection of equity by injunction if the case is otherwise a proper one for such relief,[6] injunction will not be granted unless there is some substantial right to be protected.[7] While it has been held in some cases, sometimes by virtue of express statutory provisions, that injunctive relief is not limited to cases where property rights are involved,[8] it has also been held that, in the absence of statutory provisions, injunction will not issue except in support of property rights,[9] or that it is limited to the protection of civil and property rights.[10]

Only civil rights protected. The subject matter of equitable jurisdiction being civil property and the maintenance of civil rights, injunction will issue only in cases where complainant's civil rights have been invaded.[11] Courts of equity have no jurisdiction over matters or questions of a political nature unless civil property rights are involved and will not interfere to enforce or protect purely political rights,[12] and the fact that complainant in a suit

Usual rules of equity jurisdiction
A court of equity has no authority to issue an injunction unless some property right is involved or some other right which would bring it within the usual rules of equity jurisdiction, or unless it is provided for by statute.—Ex parte Castro, 273 S.W. 795, 115 Tex. 77.

Not confined to rigid categories
The jurisdiction of equity is flexible and should not be confined to rigid categories so that the granting of an injunction will depend on nomenclature rather than on substance.—Red Canyon Sheep Co. v. Ickes, 98 F.2d 308, 69 App.D.C. 27.

Right in nature of property right
Equity will exercise its restraining powers only where there is some threatened injury to a property right or right in the nature thereof.—First Camden Nat. Bank & Trust Co. v. Wilentz, 19 A.2d 648, 129 N.J. Eq. 333.

seeking to enforce a political right by injunction assumes to litigate on behalf of other voters or of the people of the state generally does not affect the rule, as the claims thus attempted to be set up are all of the same nature and are none the less political,[13] and ample means are afforded in the courts of law for the vindication of rights of this character.[14]

However, where the court is vested with jurisdiction of all cases where the right to office, or civil or political rights, are involved, it has been held that injunction may issue in a proper case to protect political rights,[15] and, as injury to property, whether actual or prospective, is the foundation on which the jurisdiction of courts of equity rests, if there is a foundation for equitable jurisdiction the mere fact that the determination of a controversy may depend on the decision of a political question will not deprive the court of jurisdiction.[16]

c. Doubtful Rights

(1) Permanent injunction
(2) Temporary injunction

(1) Permanent Injunction

Where complainant's right is doubtful or his title is in dispute, a perpetual injunction cannot be obtained until the doubt is removed and the right made certain.

A permanent injunction should not be awarded except in a clear case and to prevent irreparable injury.[17] Where complainant's right is doubtful or his title is in dispute, a perpetual injunction cannot be obtained until the doubt is removed by a proper proceeding and the right made certain,[18] the only proper relief which may be granted in such cases being a temporary injunction maintaining the status quo until the right or title in question is established.[19]

Doubtful rights as affecting the right to enforce a contract in restraint of trade are discussed infra § 84, the right to an injunction in a suit involving a breach of contract infra § 80, or involving corporate franchises, management, and dealings infra §§ 97–99, or to enforce a restrictive covenant as to the use of land infra § 87.

(2) Temporary Injunction
(a) In general
(b) Prima facie case
(c) Disputed questions of fact or law

(a) In General

While the rule has been frequently laid down that a preliminary injunction will not issue where the right which complainant seeks to have protected is in doubt or where the right to the relief asked is doubtful, nevertheless it has often been held proper to maintain the status quo by a temporary injunction even though complainant's right to permanent relief is doubtful.

The rule has been frequently laid down broadly that a preliminary injunction will not issue where the right which complainant seeks to have protected is in doubt,[20] where the right to relief asked is doubtful,[21] or except in a clear case of right.[22] It has similarly been declared that the right asserted by complainant must be perfectly clear and free from doubt where the effect of a preliminary injunction will be more than merely the maintenance of the status quo,[23] or where the injunction will cause defendant greater loss and inconvenience than that which would be suffered by complainant in the absence of an injunction,[24] and that an injunction must be refused if complainant's case is so doubtful that it does not appear reasonably probable that he has the right claimed and that it is being violated,[25] or if he does not make it appear reasonably probable that an irreparable injury is impending and will occur before the final hearing can be had,[26] and that the acts complained of are being committed,[27] and are the real cause of the threatened or existing injury.[28]

It has also been declared that a temporary injunction will not issue where the right depends on the complicated relations of the parties, and the issues can be properly determined only by the testimony on a trial of the case,[29] and that a preliminary injunction should not be granted if the ultimate relief sought is doubtful of attainment.[30] Obviously a preliminary injunction should not be granted where it is clear that the specific relief of the sort asked for by preliminary injunction could not be awarded on the final hearing.[31]

Nevertheless, there are a large number of decisions which hold that it is not sufficient ground for refusing a preliminary injunction that it is not absolutely certain that the complainant has the right that he claims or that the injury feared will occur; and even though complainant's right to permanent relief is doubtful, it may be proper to maintain the status quo pending the determination of his right, the issuance of a temporary injunction in such cases depending chiefly on the relative inconvenience to be caused the parties.[32] Complainant, it has been said, may be entitled to a preliminary injunction in cases where his right to the relief prayed may fail on a hearing on the merits,[33] and it has been held that, where there is a prospect of irremediable injury, even though the title or right is disputed, a temporary injunction may issue at once, without waiting until a trial at law is had;[34] that the injunction may be granted, although an action at law has not been commenced;[35] and that complainant or defendant may be ordered to institute a suit at law immediately.[36]

(b) Prima Facie Case

To authorize a temporary injunction, complainant must make out at least a prima facie showing of a right to the final relief.

While it is not a ground for refusing a preliminary injunction that it is not absolutely certain that complainant has the right to relief, as considered supra subdivision c (2) (a) of this section, yet to authorize a temporary injunction, complainant must make out at least a prima facie showing of a right to the final relief.[37] It is necessary also that complainant make a full presentation of his case and of the facts;[38] and if it appears from complainant's own statement of his case that he will not be entitled to the permanent relief sought, or that his right to such relief will depend on a contingency not yet determined, no preliminary injunction should issue.[39] Nevertheless, a temporary injunction should be granted when it appears prima facie that such injunction is necessary to preserve the right asserted by plaintiff,[40] especially where the acts complained of are denied and no harm will therefore result to defendants in their being enjoined.[41] It is not necessary to show that complainant would be entitled to relief at all events on final hearing.[42] A fortiori whenever it is manifest that the ultimate outcome will be in favor of plaintiff, a preliminary injunction should issue almost as a matter of course.[43]

(c) Disputed Questions of Fact or Law

Applications for preliminary injunctions are frequently refused where the right is doubtful because of disputed questions of fact or law.

Applications for preliminary injunctions are frequently refused on the ground that the facts on which the application is based are disputed, the evidence in regard to them being conflicting,[44] but the fact that there is such a dispute or conflict is not in itself sufficient ground for refusing the application, and if complainant shows that an irreparable injury will probably be suffered by him before the final hearing, that there is a reasonable probability that he will establish the facts as he alleges, and that the injunction will not cause a great injury to defendant, a preliminary injunction should issue to maintain the status quo, despite the conflict as to facts.[45] In cases, however, where the equities of complainant's bill are satisfactorily denied in the answer, where the facts on which complainant's right is based are disputed, or where defendant denies that he is doing the injurious acts charged, no injunction will issue except to prevent an irreparable injury that will occur before final hearing can be reached.[46]

Disputed questions of law. The general rule is well settled that, when the principles of law on which the right to a preliminary injunction rests are disputed and will admit of doubt, a court of equity will not grant such injunction without a decision of the courts of law establishing such principles,[47] although satisfied as to what is a correct conclusion of law on the facts.[48] However, where the legal right, although disputed, is clear on facts which are not denied and legal rules which are well settled, and the object of the bill is to ascertain the extent of the right and enforce and protect it in a manner not attainable at law, the rights need not be first settled in an action at law,[49] and there are a number of decisions in which it is held that the fact that the right to a preliminary injunction depends on a disputed question of law is not necessarily a fatal objection to its allowance and a preliminary injunction has been awarded in such a case, although the principles justifying a departure from the general rule are not very clearly defined.[50]

Complainant must show not only the existence of his right but also that the acts sought to be restrained will be a violation thereof.

The complainant must show not only the existence of his right but he must affirmatively show that the acts sought to be restrained will be a violation thereof.[51] The doing of an act in good faith by fair and proper means for a lawful purpose cannot be restrained,[52] and where the party sought to be enjoined has the legal right to do a given thing, the courts will not inquire into his purpose in doing it.[53]

§ 20. —— Adverse Right or Claim

Where there is no present controversy and there cannot be any future controversy between the parties, a court of equity is without jurisdiction to grant injunctive relief.

Where there is no present controversy and there cannot be any future controversy between the parties, a court of equity is without jurisdiction to grant injunctive relief.[54] The necessity that there be a violation of some right of complainant in order to entitle him to an injunction is discussed supra § 19.

Remedy preventive

As the remedy by interlocutory injunction is preventive in its nature, it is not necessary that a wrong should have been actually committed before a court of equity will interfere, since, if this were required, it would in most cases defeat the very purpose for which the relief is sought, by allowing the commission of the act which complainant seeks to restrain.—Kimberly & Clark Co. v. b. Threats

While the authorities are conflicting as to whether an injunction may issue on mere threats to commit an act, it is not a condition precedent to the issuance of an injunction that actual threats to do the injury complained of have been made.

It is not a condition precedent to the issuance of an injunction that actual threats to do the injury complained of have been made, but it will be sufficient if the acts evincing such intention have been committed.[65] While, according to some decisions, mere threats to commit the act complained of unaccompanied by some overt act will not authorize the issuance of an injunction,[66] it has also been held that if defendants threaten to do the wrong and have the power to do so an injunction should issue.[67] However, the mere fact that defendant denies his intention to do the threatened act is not sufficient ground for denying the injunction,[68] as the court is not bound to accept such denial;[69] but the denial should be accepted and an injunction refused where the evidence satisfies the court that the denial is truthful,[70] and it has been held that this requirement is satisfied where there is no evidence to disprove the denial.[71]

a. In general
b. Injury suffered in common with public
c. Injury sustained prior to suit
d. Discontinuance of acts

a. In General

Subject to some exceptions, in order to entitle a person to injunctive relief, ordinarily he must establish an actual and substantial injury or an affirmative prospect thereof.

Usually a complainant is not entitled to an injunction where he can show no injury to himself from the action sought to be prevented,[72] and ordinarily, in order to entitle a person to injunctive relief, whether prohibitory or mandatory in its nature, he must establish as against defendant an actual and substantial injury or an affirmative prospect thereof.[73] This is true whether the injury is single or

Expenses incident to threatened proceeding

Subjection of complainant to the costs and expenses incident to a threatened proceeding has been held insufficient to warrant injunctive relief.—Dartmouth Woolen Mills v. Myers, D.C.N.H., 16 F.Supp. 633—continuous,[74] and especially is this true where in addition the writ would operate oppressively or contrary to true justice.[75] Thus an injunction will not be granted where the damage is so small and the right so unimportant as to make the case a trivial one,[76] or is technical and inconsequential,[77] or fanciful and sentimental,[78] or a mere inconvenience,[79] or is merely nominal, theoretical, or speculative,[80] even though an action at law might be maintained for the same injury.[81]

However, there is an obvious distinction between injury and damage that is not always observed in dealing with the question of injunctive relief,[82] and courts of equity will interpose in a proper case to protect a right, without any reference to the question of actual damage.[83] The words "substantial and serious," as applicable to damage prerequisite to the application of equity's extraordinary remedies, are used in a relative sense and their use is not intended to limit such relief to matters of large magnitude.[84] While it has been held that one whose rights would be invaded may invoke the aid of equity to prevent an act which, if done, would entitle him to damages,[85] the granting of an injunction is not governed by the mere value of the property,[86]

The presence of actual or threatened injury or damage has been held not a condition precedent to issuance of an injunction under some statutory provisions,[90] or where the state is concerned,[91] or in actions to restrain the breach of a restrictive covenant as to the use of land, as discussed infra § 87, or the breach of a contract in restraint of trade, as discussed infra § 84.

b. Injury Suffered in Common with Public

(1) General rule
(2) Exceptions to rule
(3) Special injury in addition to public injury

(1) General Rule

In the absence of special statutory regulation of the question, it has been almost universally held that where the injury complained of is in fact a public injury and the right violated is a public right, an individual cannot as a general rule maintain a suit for an injunction unless he suffers a special injury different from that suffered by the public at large.

Although it may be stated broadly that, where the subject matter of the suit affects the public, or the object of the writ is to compel the proper execution of the laws and to confine tribunals within their rightful jurisdiction or to prevent a clear transgression of their authority, any citizen of the state, county, or municipality affected may maintain the action,[92] and while there is an early case to the contrary,[93] it has been almost universally held, in the absence of special statutory regulation of the question, discussed infra subdivision b (2) of this section, that where the injury complained of is in fact a public injury, and the right violated is a public right, an individual cannot as a general rule maintain a suit for an injunction unless he suffers a special injury different from that suffered by the public at large.[94] The rule is not a technical and arbitrary one, but has a solid foundation in principle and is sustained by very sound reasons of public policy, its object being to protect defendant against a multiplicity of suits and to secure him in one suit a final determination of all the controverted questions involved.[95] In case the government is obstructed in exercising its powers and discharging its duties, it has a right to apply to its own courts for any proper assistance by way of injunction.[96]

(2) Exceptions to Rule

It has been held that equity will grant an injunction on the complaint of a private individual whenever it clearly appears that in no other proceeding can public or private interests be fully protected, and, under some statutes, a private citizen may maintain a suit for injunction regardless of whether or not he will suffer particular injury.

An exception to the general rule stated supra subdivision b (1) of this section has been recognized in some cases, which, although recognizing the general rule as stated, hold that courts of equity will grant injunctions to restrain an attempted wrong whenever it clearly appears that in no other proceeding can public or private interests be fully protected,[97] and that the writ will issue at the instance of a private individual who shows he may suffer financial injury if the contemplated wrong is not enjoined, even though it may be made to appear that a part of the public may suffer in the same way or to the same extent.[98] It has also been held that an individual may be the relator in an action to enjoin a public wrong if the public officer whose duty it is to bring the suit refuses to do so.[99] Further, in some states the general rule does not apply with reference to suits for injunctions to restrain certain sorts of public injuries because of statutes providing that any citizen may maintain a suit for injunction regardless of whether or not he will suffer particular injury.[1]

(3) Special Injury in Addition to Public Injury

If there is an injury to private property, in its nature special and peculiar to the owner thereof, constituting a private wrong, the fact that the act causing the injury may also be a disturbance or obstruction to the public right will not bar his right to an injunction.

Duty owed to complainant

One seeking injunction on account of violation of duty imposed by law must show that duty is owed to him and, if it be statutory duty, must show that statute was enacted for his advantage or for advantage of class to which he belongs.—Mosig v. Jersey Chiropodists, 194 A. 248, 122 N.J.Eq. 382.

Taxpayers cannot restrain official acts merely because they are ultra vires.—Ruark v. International Union of Operating Engineers, Local Union No. 37, 146 A. 797, 157 Md. 576.

Suit also in behalf of others

Fact that plaintiff brought suit on behalf of himself and others with-fact that the injury is a public injury will not militate against his right to an injunction.[3] It is sufficient to show that he suffered a special injury different from that suffered by the public at large;[4] he need not show that he will be damaged specially and irreparably to an extent not sustained by other property owners in the vicinity.[5]

c. Injury Sustained Prior to Suit

Since the purpose of an injunction is not to afford a remedy for what is past but to prevent future mischief, rights already lost and wrongs already perpetrated ordinarily may not be corrected by injunction.

Since the purpose of an injunction is not to afford a remedy for what is past but to prevent future mischief,[6] and as it is not used for the purpose in class did not adversely affect plaintiff's individual rights, since he established his injury or threat of injury, thereby justifying preliminary injunction.—Spang v. Roper, D.C.Pa., 13 F.Supp. 840, vacated on other grounds, C.C.A., Gossnell v. Spang, 84 F.2d 889, certiorari denied Spang v. Gossnell, 57 S.Ct. 233, 299 U.S. 605, 81 L.Ed. 446.

not yet been completed,[11] an injunction will be issued, provided, of course, the acts and the injuries resulting therefrom are within the scope of injunctive relief. On the other hand, where the acts complained of are such as cannot be enjoined the continuation, or threatening the continuation, of such acts cannot aid the case.[12]

d. Discontinuance of Acts

While the mere cessation by the defendant of the alleged acts or conduct, before or after the beginning of a suit for injunction, has been held not a bar to the issuance of an injunction, ordinarily injunction will not issue unless there is reasonable ground to believe that there will be a resumption of such activities.

A court of equity will not afford an injunction to prevent in the future that which in good faith has been discontinued in the absence of any evidence that the acts are likely to be repeated in the future.[13] However, the mere cessation by defendant of the alleged acts or conduct, before or after the beginning of a suit for injunction, has been held not a bar to the issuance of an injunction,[14] and in a proper case, as where there is a reasonable ground to believe that there will be a resumption of such activities, a court of equity may issue an injunction.[15]

Inference of repetition not supported
Where defendants' alleged violations of statute in sale of stock took place only when they for good cause thought they were not violating law and had been discontinued, their past conduct would not support an inference of repetition in the future, so as to warrant a preliminary injunction.—Securities and Exchange Commission v. § 23. —— Irreparable Injury in General

a. General rule
b. What constitutes

a. General Rule

Ordinarily, to warrant injunctive relief, it must clearly appear that some act has been done, or is threatened, which will produce irreparable injury to the party asking for such relief.

Except as changed by statute,[16] ordinarily to warrant the allowance of a writ of injunction it must clearly appear that some act has been done, or is threatened, which will produce irreparable injury to the party asking an injunction.[17] A temporary re-

Discretion of court

Whether an injunction will issue to enjoin acts abandoned by defendant since institution of suit is discretionary, and to warrant the refusal of an injunction because defendant, since action was instituted, has ceased to engage in the act sought to be enjoined, proof must be made that the abandonment is in good faith and permanent.—State ex rel. Whall v. Saenger Theatres Corporation, 200 So. 442, 190 Miss. 391.

The final test in determining whether injunction against unlawful practices should be issued is existence and manifestation of good faith by defendant, and issuance of writ depends on whether defendant's conduct in past indicates reasonable likelihood of further violations of law in future, and where defendant corporation, in its original answer and throughout trial, vigorously attacked court's jurisdiction on every possible ground, put government to its proof on every issue, and amended answer, so as to admit validity and applicability of act, only when it became readily apparent that no useful purpose would be gained by further refusal to do so, injunction should be issued as against contentions that defendant ceased all violations of act before institution of suit and was sincere in its promises not to violate any provisions thereof in future.—Wurling v. Builders' Veneer & Woodwork Co., D.C.Wis., 45 F.Supp. [illegible] straining order,[18] or a preliminary injunction[19] will not, as a general rule, be granted in a case where it is not shown that an irreparable injury is immediately impending and will be visited on complainant before the case can be brought to a final hearing. However, courts of equity, on cautionary grounds, exercise jurisdiction and act to preserve the status quo even in the absence of irreparable injury where there is threatened disturbance of the situation which is far-reaching and which it will do no real harm to hold in abeyance until the rights involved can be finally determined,[20] and under the statutes in some jurisdictions it is held that the injury need not be irreparable to authorize a temporary injunction, but that a great injury is sufficient;[21] and the statutes of some jurisdictions are broad enough to warrant the issuing of injunctions of all classes whatsoever in case great injury is shown.[22] Conversely, in an otherwise proper case, an injunction should be granted where irreparable damage would result if the injunction is not issued.[23]

b. What Constitutes

(1) In general
(2) Destruction or change of property

(1) In General

An injury is irreparable when it cannot be adequately compensated in damages, and it is not necessary that the pecuniary damage be shown to be great.

An injury to be irreparable need not be such as to render its repair physically impossible; but it is irreparable when it cannot be adequately compensated in damages,[24] or where there exists no certain pecuniary standard for the measurement of the

Beyond possibility of compensation
The term "irreparable injury," as used in the law of injunction, does not necessarily mean that the injury complained of is beyond the possibility of compensation in damages, or that the injury must be very damages.[25] This inadequacy of damages as a compensation may be due to the nature of the injury itself or to the nature of the right or property injured,[26] and according to many decisions it may also be due to the insolvency or want of responsibility of the person committing the acts complained of,[27] although some courts have reached the opposite conclusion.[28] Of course if the injury is irreparable aside from the fact of defendant's insolvency, it is of no importance whether defendant is solvent or not.[29]

To render an injury irreparable, it is not necessary that the pecuniary damage be shown to be great;[30] but on the contrary, it has been said, the fact that in an action at law the jury could award nominal damages only often furnishes the very best reason for interference by a court of equity by injunction.[31] It has also been said that the injury is irreparable when the only remedy at law is by a large number of suits for damages which by reason of their number and cost will produce no substantial results,[32] or where one is deprived of some right to property which is essential to its full use.[33] Of course, where compensation in money would be adequate, the injury cannot be said to be irreparable,[34] and an injury which has a full, complete, and adequate remedy at law is not irreparable.[35]

(2) Destruction or Change of Property

Acts which destroy or result in a serious change of property either physically or in the character in which it has been held or enjoyed have been held to do an irreparable injury.

Acts which result in a serious change of, or are destructive to, the property affected either physically or in the character in which it has been held or enjoyed,[36] or acts committed without just cause or excuse that interfere with the carrying on of complainant's business, destroying his custom, his credit, or his profits, as considered infra § 138 et seq, do an irreparable injury and authorize the issuance of a preliminary injunction.

Mere diminution in value of property without irreparable mischief will not furnish ground for injunction.—Hassinger v. Kramer, 162 N.E. 752, 28 Ohio App. 449.

a. In General

Courts of equity will freely grant injunctions to prevent a multiplicity of suits.

The prevention of a multiplicity of actions at law is one of the special grounds of equity jurisdiction, and for that purpose the remedy by injunction is freely used,[37] and that, too, although there may be a legal remedy,[38] and although the only injury resulting from the wrongful acts is pecuniary loss.[39] However, the court will consider the facts and circumstances of the particular case and will not overlook the "balance of convenience" rule,[40] and a theoretical inadequacy of the legal remedy may be outweighed by other considerations.[41] The saving of expense is not alone a sufficient ground for bringing a bill in equity.[42] Also, even though an injunction would prevent a multiplicity of actions at law, the interests of the public may be paramount to those of the complainant, and an injunction may be refused for that reason.[43] So an injunction will not be granted for the purpose of avoiding a multiplicity of suits where the party asking the injunction might have avoided the multiplicity of suits of which he complains by appropriate pleading when the case is brought.[44]

Multiplicity of actions between two parties. As a general rule, where an injury committed by one against another is continuous or is being constantly repeated, so that complainant's remedy at law requires the bringing of successive actions, that remedy is inadequate and the injury will be prevented by injunction.[45] The fact that an injured person has the right of successive actions for the continuance of the wrong does not make it an adequate remedy at law which bars the jurisdiction of a court of equity to grant an injunction to restrain the continuance of the injury.[46] On the other hand it has been held that an injunction will not be granted to relieve one person from the necessity of suing another for a succession of wrongful acts, where the remedy at law is adequate;[47] and it may be a prerequisite that the complainant first establish his right at law.[48]

b. Numerous Parties

In proper cases, equity will relieve a complainant of the burdensome necessity of bringing or defending a multiplicity of suits, by enjoining the performance of wrongful acts injurious to him.

Where the consummation of a wrongful act will injure complainant, and in order to obtain redress at law he would be required to bring many actions against many persons, he is entitled to an injunction to prevent the performance of the act,[49] where the rights of all depend on the same questions both of law and fact.[50]

Also where the consummation of a wrongful or illegal act will probably result in many disputed claims and many actions at law against complainant, his remedy at law is inadequate and he is entitled to the protection of equity by injunction.[51]

(1) General Rule

As a general rule, an injunction will not be granted where the remedy at law for the injury complained of is full, adequate, and complete.

Except where such rule may be changed by statute,[52] an injunction ordinarily will not be granted where the remedy at law for the injury complained of is full, adequate, and complete.[53] Conversely, a court of equity has jurisdiction to grant an injunc-tertaining an action by a debtor to compel them to litigate their claims in an action in the forum he selects. —American Trading Company v. Monserrat, 18 Puerto Rico 268—32 C.J. p 55 note 27 [b].

tion where an adequate and complete remedy cannot be had in the courts of law.[54] The ground of jurisdiction of a court of equity is its ability to afford more complete remedies than courts of law can afford—bound and tied down to remedies which they are not capable of moulding and adapting to the necessities of particular cases—thereby preventing irreparable injuries, preventing a multiplicity of suits, and avoiding vexatious litigation. As the court is not in the exercise of its ordinary jurisdiction, but is interfering to supply the deficiency of legal remedies, it interferes only where there is immediate pressing necessity for the prevention of injury, incapable of adequate compensation in damages at law, or such as from its continuance or permanent mischief must occasion a constantly recurring grievance which cannot be otherwise prevented but by an injunction,[55] and equity does not assume the burden of preventing contemplated legal wrongs on the theory that subsequent remedies at law may prove inadequate or less satisfactory,[56] or that a court of law will decide the question presented incorrectly.[57]

(2) Sufficiency of Legal Remedy

(a) In general

(b) Insolvency of defendant

(a) In General

In order to warrant the denial of an injunction because of the existence of a remedy at law, such remedy must be plain, adequate, and complete, and it has been held that it must be as practical and efficient as is the equitable remedy.

All the courts agree as to the general rule, considered supra subdivision a (1) of this section, the problem in any individual case being whether the remedy at law is adequate,[58] to be determined under all the circumstances of the case and in view of the conduct of the parties.[59]

Plain, adequate, and complete. The remedy at law must be plain, for if it be doubtful and obscure equity will not refuse to assume jurisdiction.[60] Also, the remedy at law must be adequate, that is, fully sufficient,[61] for if it falls short of what a party is entitled to, that founds a jurisdiction in equity.[62] So, too, the remedy at law must be complete,[63] that is, it must contain the full end and justice of the case, reach the whole mischief, and secure the whole right of the party in a perfect manner at the present time and in future; otherwise equity will interfere and give such relief and aid as the exigency of the particular case may require.[64]

Practical, efficient and prompt. The mere existence of some remedy at law does not necessarily defeat the equitable jurisdiction;[65] the legal remedy must be as practical and efficient as is the equitable remedy in rendering justice and as prompt in its administration.[66] An injunction is in many cases more prompt and efficient than any legal remedy,

Rules for determination

(1) There is no rule, except the rule of reason, which can be applied to determine when an action at law is or is not an adequate remedy.—Spaulding v. Mayo, 122 A. 899, 81 N. H. 85.

(2) Whether there is an adequate remedy at law for a wrong is a question that is not decided by narrow and artificial rules.—Kirk v. Clark, 4 S.E.2d 13, 191 S.C. 205.

Discretion

The granting of an injunction as against objection that legal remedy is adequate is a matter of discretion.—U. S. v. City of Hoboken, N. J., D.C.N.J., 29 F.2d 932.

Relief as full and complete as injunction

Adequate legal remedy means a remedy which will afford relief as full and complete as injunction would afford.—Youngblood v. Youngblood, Tex.Civ.App., 163 S.W.2d 731.

Complete relief doubtful

Where complete relief is doubtful, and a more ample and appropriate remedy may be thereby afforded, equity will take cognizance and give relief, if it can be done in accordance with recognized principles of chancery jurisdiction.—Price v. Gordon, 177 So. 276, 129 Fla. 715—Morgan v. City of Lakeland, 107 So. 269, 90 Fla. 525.

Full compensation

The nonexistence of an adequate legal remedy by which the complainant may be fully compensated in damages is not only the foundation, but also an indispensable prerequisite for the exercise by equity of its power to grant injunctive relief.—Burton v. Sparks, 36 N.E.2d 962, 109 Ind.App. 531.

"If the available legal remedy in a given case reduces itself to a matter of words, rather than to a matter of efficacy, because of its impracticability * * * equity will hold that the existence of the legal remedy is not an obstacle to the exertion of the equitable power."—Kirk v. and because of this promptness and efficiency there is a strong tendency to grant injunctions in cases where formerly the remedy at law would have been deemed fully adequate.[67]

Negligence of party asking injunction. The remedy at law is not regarded as inadequate, where the injustice is likely to occur because of the party's own negligence, and in such case an injunction will not be granted.[68]

(b) Insolvency of Defendant

While it has been held that insolvency alone is never a ground for equitable interference by injunction, there is also authority to the effect that an injunction may be granted on the ground that defendant is insolvent, where except for such insolvency, an action for damages would be an adequate remedy.

The solvency or insolvency of defendant is not important where the injunction is sought on the ground of the impossibility of measuring the injury in terms of money; there the remedy at law is inadequate, however responsible defendant may be.[69] Nevertheless, under certain circumstances in considering what is an adequate remedy at law the court may take into consideration the pecuniary responsibility of defendant.[70] Insolvency of defendant is frequently an added ground for an injunction where complainant is really entitled on other grounds to the relief asked.[71]

While there is authority that insolvency alone is never a ground for equitable interference by injunction,[72] especially in cases where there are positive reasons why equity should not take jurisdiction and in cases over which the equitable jurisdiction has never been extended,[73] there is also authority to the effect that an injunction may be granted on the ground that defendant is insolvent where except for such insolvency, an action for damages would be an adequate remedy.[74] Thus an insolvent defendant has been enjoined from making a wrongful transfer of property,[75] from wrongfully paying out money that belongs to complainant, as considered infra § 76, or from doing other wrongful acts to the injury of complainant.[76] Also, suits for the purchase money of property have often been restrained where defendant therein has a set-off that he could make use of only in a separate action, and that action would afford him an inadequate remedy because the other party is insolvent,[77] and the payment of money by third persons to one who is insolvent may be restrained at the suit of those entitled to the money.[78]

Obviously, however, where damages would fully compensate for the injury and defendant is solvent and able to respond, no injunction should issue.[79]

b. Exceptions to Rule

Although there may be an adequate remedy at law, it is no objection to the granting of an injunction where complainant, for reasons beyond his control, cannot avail himself of it, or where equity has jurisdiction for some other purpose.

The existence of a remedy at law which would ordinarily be available is no objection to the granting of an injunction when, for reasons beyond his control, complainant cannot avail himself of it;[80] and the same has been held to be true where the remedy must be sought in a foreign court.[81] Also, the general rule does not apply where both parties represent the public, so that the loss must fall on the public whichever party succeeds.[82]

Where defendants come to a hearing on the merits, it is too late for them to say that plaintiffs have an adequate remedy at law where no such objection to the jurisdiction of the court was raised in the answer.[83]

Injunction incidental to other relief. There is authority that an injunction may be granted as incidental to relief asked in a case where equity has jurisdiction for some other purpose, even though the law might afford a sufficient remedy for the specific injury sought to be prevented by the injunction.[84] Equity having jurisdiction for one purpose may dispose of the entire matter in its own way.[85] The right to the injunction stands or falls with the right to the principal relief asked to which the injunction is incidental.[86]

c. Applications of Rule

(1) In general
(2) Statutory remedy
(3) Damages as remedy
(4) Mandamus as remedy

(1) In General

The general rule that an injunction will not be granted where there is an adequate remedy at law has been applied where complainants had various particular remedies at law, such as ejectment, replevin, etc.

The general rule that an injunction will not be granted where there is an adequate remedy at law has been applied where there was an adequate remedy by ejectment,[87] replevin,[88] trespass,[89] forcible entry and detainer,[90] a proceeding to establish boundaries,[91] or an action for damages, as considered infra subdivision c (3) of this section.

Complainant is not entitled to an injunction where there is an action already pending in which he may obtain relief.[92] Thus, a party to a pending suit is not entitled to relief by injunction with reference to any matter affected by that suit, when he might obtain adequate relief by a motion in that suit itself.[93] Also, an injunction will not be granted when relief may be obtained by appeal or certiorari, as considered infra § 40, by a writ of prohibition,[94] by attachment,[95] by habeas corpus,[96] by quo warranto,[97] or by mandamus, as considered infra subdivision c (4) of this section. So an injunction will not be granted where the acts or proceedings on which a claim may be asserted are void on their face, such fact constituting a good defense to any future proceeding at law.[98]

(2) Statutory Remedy

As a general rule, where a statutory remedy has been provided for any particular wrong or injury, no relief in equity can be afforded by injunction. However, if such remedy obviously is not adequate, a bill for injunction may lie.

Where a remedy for any particular wrong or injury has been provided by statute, the general rule is that no relief in equity can be afforded in such case by injunction.[99] Constitutional objections being eliminated, a court of chancery will not intervene merely to better such remedy as the legislature has deemed sufficient,[1] and it has been said that the general rule is applicable although the provisions of the statute may conflict with the notions of natural justice entertained by a court of chancery.[2] However, if the statutory remedy obviously is not adequate a bill for injunction may lie.[3] Of course, the rule has no application unless the acts complained of are within the purview of the statute providing the remedy.[4]

(3) Damages as Remedy

Where damages will constitute an adequate compensation for the injury threatened or inflicted, equity will not interfere by injunction.

As the principal remedy afforded by courts of law for an injury is money damages, if such damages will constitute an adequate compensation for the injury threatened or inflicted, equity will not interfere by injunction.[5] In such case plaintiff must resort to an action at law for the damages sustained,[6] and especially is this doctrine applicable where the granting of an injunction would inconvenience the public.[7]

However, the mere fact that damages are recoverable at law is no objection to the granting of an injunction in case such damages would not be an adequate compensation for the injury.[8] An action for damages is an inadequate remedy where there is no method by which the amount of the damage can be accurately computed,[9] or where the amount

Absence of, or trivial, monetary damage

The absence of monetary damage accompanying the invasion or threatened invasion of a right, or the fact that the monetary damage is trivial, evidences the inadequacy of a remedy at law, and is not a reason for denying injunctive relief but rather supports an application for such relief.—Miles Laboratories v. Seignious, D.C.S.C., 30 F.Supp. 549.

(4) Mandamus as Remedy

As a general rule, a mandatory injunction will not be granted where mandamus furnishes an adequate remedy.

While there is some authority to the contrary,[11] the well settled rule is that a mandatory injunction will not be granted where mandamus furnishes an adequate remedy.[12] Such is the case where the object of the bill is to compel the performance of some official ministerial act as required by law,[13] or to test the validity of a legislative apportionment,[14] or to compel a public service corporation to perform a quasi-public duty;[15] and mandamus is the proper and adequate remedy to compel a municipal corporation to apply its funds in payment of a judgment, as considered infra § 122.

Nevertheless an injunction may issue where mandamus would not be sufficiently prompt to afford relief,[16] or for any other reason would not be adequate;[17] and where the relief asked is prohibitory in its nature injunction and not mandamus is the proper remedy.[18]

d. Remedy outside Courts

Where complainant has an adequate means of redress in his own hands, or before a public or private quasi judicial tribunal, he ordinarily is not entitled to an injunction.

Where complainant has an adequate means of redress in his own hands;[19] or before a public[20] or private[21] quasi-judicial tribunal, he ordinarily is not entitled to an injunction.

However, it has been held no objection to an injunction that complainant may have the right to redress his own grievance by force. Although he may be allowed to take the law into his own hands in some cases, the law will in no case compel him so to do.[22]

§ 26. Conduct and Motive of Complainant

a. In general
b. Estoppel, waiver, and election

a. In General

The complainant must show that he is entitled in good conscience to the injunction which he seeks. Where the right to injunction is shown, the motive actuating him usually is held to be immaterial.

It is the duty of the court to take into consideration the conduct and situation of the parties in determining whether or not the relief asked by way of injunction should be given.[23] Plaintiff must show that he is equitably and in good conscience entitled to relief by injunction in addition to showing equitable grounds for relief,[24] and, where the established facts do not show any superior equity entitling complainant to the injunction asked as against defendant, it should not be granted.[25]

Motive. The court ordinarily will not inquire into the motives which actuate plaintiff in bringing the suit.[26] Where he shows a right to an injunction, it is immaterial that he is seeking it for other purposes than the assertion and enforcement of the rights on which he relies.[27]

Coming into equity with clean hands. The maxim that he who comes into equity must come with clean hands, as discussed in Equity § 93 et seq, is, of course, applicable in suits to obtain relief by injunction.[28] Injunction will be denied, even though complainant shows that he has a right and would otherwise be entitled to the remedy in case it appears that he himself acted dishonestly, fraudulently, or illegally in respect of the matter in which redress is sought,[29] or where he has encouraged, invited, or contributed to the injury sought to be enjoined.[30] However, the general principle that he who comes into equity must come with clean hands applies only to plaintiff's conduct in relation to the very matter in litigation.[31] The want of equity that will bar a right to equitable relief for coming into court with unclean hands must be so directly connected with the matter in litigation that it has affected the equitable relations of the parties arising out of the transaction in question.[32]

Doing equity. The maxim that he who seeks equity must do equity, as discussed in Equity § 90 et seq, applies with full force and effect to suits to obtain injunctions.[33]

Contradictory testimony

Plaintiff's testimony, contradictory of former testimony and declaration in prior suit, was held not to preclude relief on ground of perjury.—Buckeye Cotton Oil Co. v. Ragland, C.C.A.Miss., 11 F.2d 231.

Legal or equitable rights

If the complainant's rights are legal as well as equitable, the court of equity may perhaps, on the final hearing or on the application for preliminary injunction, consider the question of motive as bearing on the right to equitable relief, or remitting complainant to his purely legal rights. Where, however, his property rights are equitable only, it would seem to be clear that whatever his motives in prosecuting the suit may be, he is not only entitled to have his case heard on final hearing, but also to have the protection by preliminary injunction, if his right is sufficiently established and such protection is absolutely necessary for the protection, pendente lite, of the equitable right.—Hodge v. b. Estoppel, Waiver, and Election

Injunctive relief will be barred by acts of the complainant constituting estoppel, waiver, or election of remedies.

If complainant has himself acted in such a way as to raise an estoppel against him, he will not be granted an injunction to prevent the act in question.[34] Also his conduct may be such as to constitute the waiver of a right to injunction.[35] It has been held that, where a suit is brought for an injunction and damages and payment of partial damages in satisfaction is accepted, such election precludes complainant from thereafter claiming an injunction.[36]

Laches as a ground for denial of injunctive relief is discussed infra § 171.

§ 27. Former Injunction or Application Therefor

a. In general
b. Injunction already in force or application pending therefor

a. In General

Ordinarily, where an injunction has been refused, or dissolved if granted, the complainant may thereafter be entitled to an injunction only on grounds which did not exist when the first bill was filed.

Successive injunction suits, even on new grounds, are not favored,[37] and on a subsequent application an injunction ordinarily should be refused, or dissolved if granted, where the new, supplemental, or amended bill contains the same grounds as those alleged in the first bill.[38] However, where an injunction has been refused, or has been granted and dissolved, by the court, complainant may be entitled to an injunction, if he amends his bill or files a supplemental or new bill setting up new grounds which did not exist when the first bill was filed;[39] but, except where a salutary rule of public policy would otherwise be infringed,[40] successive injunctions on different grounds which might have been put at issue in a prior proceeding should not be allowed,[41] where no sufficient reason why the grounds were not urged on the first application for an injunction

Homestead exemption

The rule that a party having several grounds for obtaining an injunction must urge all of them in one suit is not applicable to an injunction to restrain foreclosure sale of a homestead exemption because the homestead exemption is a matter of public policy, and is granted not so much in favor of the head of a family as in favor of the dependent members of the family, and also because the homestead exemption does not give to the beneficiary the absolute right to prevent seizure or sale thereof, but gives the beneficiary the right merely to require that the property shall not be sold except for a sum exceeding a specified amount. —Lee v. Cooper, supra.

is shown;[42] and ignorance neither of the law nor of the facts will present any excuse for failure to present such grounds.[43] It has been held that the issuing, through inadvertence, of a void order for injunctive relief does not preclude the court from thereafter granting a valid order therefor on the same grounds.[44]

The refusal to grant an injunction pendente lite without bond is no bar to a second application for the issuance of such an injunction on bond.[45]

b. Injunction Already in Force or Application Pending Therefor

Ordinarily, where a prior injunction has been obtained and is still in force, a second injunction in the same or another court will be refused.

If complainant has obtained an injunction in one court and that injunction is still in force, a second injunction in that or in another court will be refused.[46] While it has been broadly stated that it is only where the first injunction has been withdrawn by agreement and satisfactory grounds are shown for a renewal that a second injunction will be granted,[47] the issuance of an injunction prohibiting a corporation through its officers, agents, and servants from committing designated acts does not preclude the issuance of an injunction prohibiting certain of its officers from committing such acts in their individual capacity,[48] and the issuance of an injunction restraining a person from doing certain acts has been held not to preclude the issuance of an injunction against the same person and another, as joint defendants, from committing such acts.[49]

The mere pendency of another bill asking for the same relief is no objection to the granting of an injunction,[50] but a temporary injunction may be denied where another injunction suit in a court of coordinate jurisdiction between the same parties and seeking the same relief is pending.[51]

Counter injunction. If complainant has been enjoined from erecting a structure, he cannot obtain an injunction to prevent interference with his erecting such structure.[52]

§ 28. —— Successive Injunctions

The effect of a former injunction or an application therefor is considered supra § 27.

§ 29. Injunction Ineffectual or Unnecessary

a. In general
b. Change in circumstances after suit brought

a. In General

Usually an injunction will not be granted if it is unenforceable, unnecessary, or ineffectual.

An injunction will be refused where the circumstances are such that the injunction cannot be enforced by the court,[53] or where such enforcement would require a continuous supervision on the part of the court,[54] or where there is no necessity therefor,[55] or where for any reason it can be of no benefit to complainant,[56] or could not correct the mischief complained of,[57] or would bring about the very conditions which it is sought to prevent.[58]

However, an injunction will not be refused merely because of a lack of power in the court to enforce its decree in case one of defendants can and may disregard it,[59] or because the court cannot regulate the incidental consequences of its decree when there exists an executive agency with power to prescribe such regulations.[60] Also, an injunction will not be denied because it would have the effect of enjoining a subsequent act of defendant which would otherwise produce the same result as the act sought to be enjoined.[61]

Injuria sine damno. A defendant will not be enjoined from doing an illegal or wrongful act where, because of the illegality or for other reasons, the attempted action will be void and of no effect, and hence of no injury to complainant;[62] but, where such invalidity appears only in connection with outside facts which must be established by evidence aliunde, it has been held that an injunction will not be refused.[63]

b. Change in Circumstances after Suit Brought

Where events occur after the filing of the bill which render an injunction unnecessary or ineffectual, it will ordinarily be refused.

It has been said that equity acts in the present tense,[64] and that relief is dependent on present and future conditions rather than solely on those existing when the suit was brought.[65] While an injunction will not be denied where the question has not really become moot either because there still remains a justiciable issue,[66] or because petitioner was injury which the parties will sustain by the granting or refusal of an injunction.

Ordinarily, on application for an injunction, the court will in the exercise of the wide discretion with which it is vested take into consideration the relative inconvenience or injury which the parties will sustain by the granting or refusal of the application for an injunction.[72] The rule is laid down in a large number of decisions that, when the issuance of an injunction will cause great injury to defendant, and will confer no benefit or very little benefit in comparison on complainant, it is proper to refuse the injunction,[73] especially where the right is doubtful,[74] or where money damages will compensate plaintiff,[75] or where the wrong may be otherwise redressed,[76] or where complainant may at comparatively slight cost protect himself.[77] For obvious reasons the injunction should be refused where its effect would work irreparable injury and be detrimental to whichever party was successful in the suit.[78] Conversely, an injunction should not be granted merely on the theory that no material injury will result to the party enjoined.[79]

The general rule is not applicable to all cases.[80] Thus it does not apply to cases controlled by positive statutory enactments,[81] or to suits to enjoin breach of restrictive covenants as to the use of land, as shown infra § 87, and it has been held in numerous decisions that, if it is clear that there is a violation of a right of complainant and his injury is regarded as irreparable and his other remedies inadequate, he is ordinarily entitled to an injunction, even though the injury inflicted by the acts complained of is relatively small as compared with the injury which will accrue to defendant as a result of the issuance of an injunction.[82] Also the rule will not be applied in cases where the wrong complained of is so unwarranted and unprovoked as properly to deprive the wrongdoer of the benefit of any consideration as to its injurious consequences,[83] as, for

If damage and injury resulting to defendant by grant of injunction will be so great as to be unconscionable in view of benefits to be derived from injunction by plaintiff, the court will act with great reluctance and will seek remedy at law by which plaintiff's rights may be protected without undue injury to defendant.—Weis v. b. Temporary or Preliminary Injunction

On an application for a preliminary injunction the court in the exercise of its discretionary powers will consider the relative convenience or inconvenience to the parties resulting from the grant or refusal of relief.

On an application for a preliminary injunction the court, in the exercise of its discretionary powers, will consider what is commonly described as the balance of convenience, that is to say, it will consider whether a greater injury would be done by granting the injunction than would result from a refusal thereof.[86] If it is shown that the refusal of the injunction would cause complainant great inconvenience and injury, and that the granting thereof would result in but little injury or inconvenience to defendant, the court will ordinarily grant the injunction, although complainant's right may be doubtful or not clearly established,[87] but, on the other

Clearly on side of complainant

Since a temporary ex parte injunction is particularly drastic, the balance of inconveniences must be very clearly on the side of complainant before such relief will be granted.—Wood Bros. Thresher Co. v. Eicher, 1 N.W.2d 655, 231 Iowa 550.

Protection of defendant by bond

(1) Where the denial of a motion for preliminary injunction will result in great injury to plaintiff and in defendant's getting substantial advantage to which he would be entitled only as the result of a final adjudication in his favor, the preliminary injunction should be granted if defendant's interest can be protected by an indemnifying bond.—Selchow & Righter Co. v. Western Printing & Lithographing Co., C.C.A.Wis., 112 F. 2d 430, affirming, D.C., 29 F.Supp. 569.

(2) Temporary injunction was hand, a temporary injunction will usually be denied in a doubtful case where the granting of it would cause greater detriment to defendant should he ultimately prevail than would be caused to complainant by its refusal if he should ultimately prevail.[88] Also, where the inconvenience to result is equally divided as between the parties, the injunction will usually be denied.[89] The doubt may relate either to the facts or the law of the case or both.[90]

§ 31. Injury or Inconvenience to Public or Third Persons

On an application for an injunction the court will take into consideration the inconvenience or injury to the public or third persons which may result from the granting of such relief.

On an application for an injunction it is the duty of the court to take into consideration the injury or inconvenience which may result to the public if an injunction is awarded.[91] Accordingly, while there are cases in which an injunction has been granted,[92]

granted plaintiff with requirement that it provide adequate bond, pending hearing on merits, where likelihood of injury to defendants caused by granting temporary injunction was trivial and injury to plaintiff which would be occasioned by denial of temporary injunction would be serious, if not irreparable, should final hearing disclose plaintiff to be entitled to injunctive relief.—Menominee & Marinette Light & Traction Co. v. Financial responsibility of defendant
In an action in which defendants were apparently financially responsible, plaintiff was held not entitled to a temporary injunction where defendants' business would be irreparably damaged thereby.—John Aquino, Inc., v. Luigi Bosca & Figlia, 270 N. Y.S. 152, 241 App.Div. 760.

Security in lieu of injunction
Under statutes giving courts broad powers in issuance of temporary injunction, an injunction should not be granted if its effect would be to interrupt defendant's operations in mining gravel and perhaps seriously impair defendant's credit and injuriously affect employment of numerous persons, where plaintiffs' rights can be protected by requiring defendant to give bond or by appointing a receiver.—Hurwitz v. Mere pretense of public interest
If the alleged necessity for protecting the public interest and convenience is nothing more than a pretense and a cloak for the unlawful appropriation of private property to suit defendant's convenience, no reason exists why an injunction should not be granted, to restrain such unlawful acts.—Minto v. Salem Water, Light & Power Co., 250 P. 722, 728, 120 Or. 202, citing Corpus Juris—32 C.J. p 82 note 44.

Injunction allowed
(1) Rule that one cannot sit idly by while his property is being devoted to public use and expensive works erected to that end and then assert claim to injunctive relief, having its foundation chiefly to the inconvenience to the public if service is interrupted by issuance of injunction, should not apply unless public is interested and unless service is to be impaired.—Miller & Lux v. San Joaquin Light & Power Corporation, 65 P.2d 1289, 8 Cal.2d 427.

(2) Where public has no interest in construction which plaintiff desires removed from his land, the rule protecting improvement from injunctive relief does not apply.—Los Angeles Brick & Clay Products Co. v. City of Los Angeles, Cal.App., 141 P. 2d 46.

ordinarily, when the issuance of an injunction will cause serious public inconvenience or loss, without a correspondingly great advantage to complainant, no injunction will be granted,[93] and this is so, even though, as against defendant, complainant would be entitled to its issuance.[94]

The general rule under consideration has been applied where the allowance of an injunction would seriously interfere with or work detriment to public works or works of public benefit,[95] where the issuance of the injunction asked would result in cutting off the public water supply,[96] or the supply of electricity for lights and power,[97] or where it would deprive the public of a necessary railroad,[98] street,[99] sidewalk,[1] bridge,[2] public ferry,[3] canal,[4] or viaduct,[5] or prevent the necessary discharge of sewage,[6] or interfere with the public system of taxation.[7] of its discretion will consider the injury or inconvenience which will result to third persons by the issuance of an injunction.[8]

§ 32. Other Objections to Issuance

Where a crime would naturally and directly vest property in a criminal, injunction will issue to prevent such result, although a contract, a will, or a statute is thereby nullified.

Where a crime would naturally and directly vest property in a criminal, injunction will issue to prevent such result, although a contract, a will, or a statute is thereby nullified. In the application of this rule it is immaterial whether the crime was committed for that purpose or with some other felonious design.[9]

§ 33. —— Furtherance of Illegal Act

An injunction will not be granted where the effect thereof would be to aid an act which, if done, would be criminal or illegal.

A court of equity will not grant an injunction, the effect of which would be in aid of an act which, if done, would be criminal or illegal,[10] and, when the objection of violation of property rights is raised in an effort to circumvent laws designed to protect the public interest, injunctive relief will not be granted to aid the attempt.[11]

§ 34. Persons Who May Be Restrained in General

An injunction will not be issued restraining a defendant from taking certain action unless he is himself the person attempting to take such action or is the person in control thereof.

An injunction issues against persons, and does not issue to suppress a business as such.[12] An injunction will not be issued restraining defendant from taking certain action unless he is himself the person attempting to take such action or is the person in control thereof.[13] On the other hand it is no reason for refusing an injunction that defendant in committing the injurious acts did not act for himself and receive no benefit,[14] or that he is not the only guilty party,[15] or that others contributed to the results against which the injunction is sought.[16]

Persons who may be restrained from breach of contract are discussed infra § 95; from boycotts, infra §§ 140, 141; from picketing, infra § 143; from committing acts in the course of labor disputes, infra § 147; and from the improper use of trade secrets, infra § 148. Restraint of corporate officers is considered infra § 106, and injunctions against public officers and boards infra §§ 108–122. sons entitled to restrain actions or other legal proceedings are discussed infra § 51; to enjoin trespass or other injury to property, infra § 58; to restrain a breach of contract, infra § 94; to enjoin municipalities or municipal officers, infra § 111; to restrain payment or disposition of public funds, infra § 122; to enjoin unauthorized contracts of public bodies, infra § 120; to restrain boycotts, infra §§ 140, 141; or to prevent the improper use of trade secrets, infra § 148. The necessity that there be an actual or threatened violation of a right in order to entitle a person to an injunction generally is considered supra § 21.

III. SUBJECTS OF PROTECTION AND RELIEF

A. ACTIONS AND OTHER LEGAL PROCEEDINGS

§ 36. In General

In the absence of a constitutional or statutory provision otherwise, the power of a court of equity to enjoin an action or proceeding at law in a proper case is well settled.

Except where the right to pursue a remedy at law is positively given by constitutional or statutory provision,[18] the power of courts of equity in a proper case to enjoin actions or proceedings at law is of long settled standing, and rests on the clear authority vested in them over persons within their jurisdiction,[19] and the propriety of affording such relief resting in the court's discretion to be exercised according to the circumstances of the particular case.[20] Litigation at law, however, may be enjoined only where plaintiff has already, satisfactorily, established his right at law,[21] or where those controverting such right are so numerous that a multiplicity of suits would result.[22]

§ 37. Grounds for Relief in General

a. More adequate remedy
b. Equities warranting or requiring injunction in general
c. Prevention of irreparable injury
d. Protection of officers of court
e. Confining litigation to one forum
f. Aid of equitable remedy.
g. Fraud
h. Accident and mistake

a. More Adequate Remedy

Equity will enjoin an action at law where equity affords a more adequate remedy than is available in the law action and where the equities invoking equity jurisdiction are apparent and strong.

Equity will interfere to enjoin an action or proceeding at law where equity affords a plainer and more adequate and complete remedy for the wrong complained of than can be afforded in the law action or proceeding.[23] This power of equity, however, is to be sparingly exercised, and only when other remedies are inadequate and the equities invoking it are apparent and strong,[24] and when by

The general test in determining whether an equity suit will lie to enjoin an action at law and try its issues in the equity suit is whether the two suits could have been joined originally, and that depends on whether a misjoinder or multifariousness would result.—Beavers v. compelling issues of sufficient fact or law it is required to do so to protect the parties' rights.[25]

Inadequacy of remedy at law. Subject to the rules relating to the adequacy or inadequacy of a remedy at law as a ground for equity jurisdiction in general, as discussed in Equity §§ 19–38, inadequacy of remedies at law, in this connection, mean that the ordinary processes of the law, under the circumstances of the particular case, are not fitted or adapted to the end in view,[26] as where the law court could adjudicate some questions but could not afford adequate and full relief.[27] The remedy at law is not inadequate merely because no appeal is allowed from the judgment in the action sought to be enjoined,[28] or because the court refuses to grant a continuance or to postpone a trial, this being a matter of discretion for that court,[29] or because complainant is unable to furnish the bond required by law as a prerequisite to the remedy,[30] or because the action will cause expense to the person asking the injunction and to the general public,[31] or that the well settled rules of law will work a hardship in the individual case.[32] When the bringing in of new parties is necessary in order to do complete justice, and this cannot be done at law, equity will assume jurisdiction of the case and enjoin the proceedings at law.[33]

b. Equities Warranting or Requiring Injunction in General

Injunction will be granted only where it appears clearly that the prosecution of the law action will result in a fraud, gross wrong, or oppression, and that justice clearly requires equitable interference.

ess.[43] A mere threat of suit,[44] or a mere apprehension or fear that an action may be brought in the future,[45] or that the court of law may decide improperly[46] is not sufficient for injunctive relief.

d. Protection of Officers of Court

An action against an officer of a court of equity for carrying out his orders ordinarily will be enjoined.

If an officer of a court of equity is sued at law for carrying out his orders, the action ordinarily will be enjoined;[47] and this rule applies for the protection of a solicitor, as an officer of the court, in the proper conduct of his duties.[48] Where, however, the officer has transcended his authority and interfered with the personal rights of others, the court may allow the injured person to seek his redress by an action at law, and refuse an injunction.[49]

e. Confining Litigation to One Forum

An injunction may be issued to restrain the removal of litigation from a forum having jurisdiction thereof to another forum.

Where a court whose power is adequate to the administration of complete justice in the premises has acquired jurisdiction of a case, the litigation should be confined to that forum, and any attempt by either party to divert the litigation to another court will be restrained by injunction,[50] especially after an adverse decision on the claim of the party seeking relief in a new forum.[51] The observance of this rule is essential to the due and orderly administration of justice and the integrity of judgments and decrees,[52] and in order to render valid its operation it is not essential that the element of irreparable damage should be involved.[53] Furthermore the propriety of the remedy by injunction is not affected by the fact that the court subsequently acquiring jurisdiction of the matter has equity as well as common-law powers.[54]

f. Aid of Equitable Remedy

Equity having acquired jurisdiction may grant an injunction in aid of the equitable remedy, such as to obtain a discovery.

Where complainant shows himself to be entitled to some purely equitable remedy, thus giving equity jurisdiction of the case, an injunction will be granted to restrain pending or threatened actions at law concerning the same subject matter,[55] in order

In suit for accounting
Defendant in a law action on common counts was entitled to continue litigation in equity in suit for accounting and to enjoin further proceeding at law where controversy beto prevent circuity of action and a multiplicity of suits and to render justice more completely and conveniently.[56]

To obtain discovery. An injunction may be issued, in a proper case, on a bill for discovery.[57] A court of equity may compel a discovery in aid of a defense at law and enjoin proceedings at law until an answer to the bill of discovery has been obtained,[58] and it does not lose this jurisdiction because the law court's powers have been enlarged by statute so as to make the equitable remedy unnecessary under some circumstances.[59] The discovery sought, however, must be of facts which are material and incapable of proof without the answer of defendant,[60] and it must be shown wherein the facts are material, as the court will not rely exclusively on the party's own opinion as to the materiality of the disclosure sought.[61]

g. Fraud

Fraud ordinarily is not a ground for enjoining an action at law unless it gives the person bringing the action an unfair advantage and the court at law cannot give complete and adequate relief against the fraud.

As a general rule, an action at law based on or involving fraud will not be enjoined if there is nothing in the nature of the fraud or inquiries to which it gives rise which affords a reason why complete and adequate redress cannot be had at law.[62] On the other hand, an action at law will be enjoined where by reason of the fraud the person bringing the action has an unfair advantage in the law court which cannot give to complainant complete and adequate relief against the fraud;[63] but the unfair advantage must be due to the fraud, and not to negligence on the part of complainant.[64] In any event, an injunction will not be granted on the ground of fraud if the facts alleged do not amount to fraud[65] or the fraudulent representations were made by a third person, not acting for plaintiff at law.[66]

tween parties grew out of a construction contract and numerous collateral agreements affecting interpretation thereof, and it was shown that there were unsettled accounts between parties and transactions that were involved to extent that court of equity could treat them more efficaciously than a court of law.—North American Const. Co. v. Olson, 179 So. 659, 131 Fla. 440.

66. Va.—Griffith v. Reynolds, 4 Gratt. 46, 45 Va. 46.

h. Accident and Mistake

Equity will enjoin the use of an advantage gained in an action at law by accident or mistake.

A court of equity will interfere to restrain by injunction the use of an advantage gained in a court of law, which must necessarily make that court an instrument of injustice, in cases where such advantage has been gained by accident or mistake.[67] On the other hand accident and mistake have been held to constitute no ground for enjoining an action at law where there has been no refusal to correct the mistake on the part of the person sought to be enjoined,[68] or where he acknowledges the error and offers to rectify it.[69] The usual rules apply in the matter of requiring the mistake to be mutual[70] and in cases where the mistake is purely a mistake of law.[71] Accident and mistake may also be made grounds for granting an injunction of an action at law, and for other specific equitable relief.[72]

a. In General

To prevent a multiplicity of suits or circuity of action, a court of equity may determine the rights of all the parties in one proceeding and enjoin all the pending or threatened actions at law relating to the same subject matter.

In the exercise of its jurisdiction to prevent a multiplicity of suits or a circuity of action, as discussed generally in Equity §§ 42, 43, and supra § 24, a court of equity may determine the rights of all the parties in one proceeding and enjoin all the pending or threatened actions at law relating to the same subject matter or cause of action,[73] or according to some decisions may restrain the prosecution of every suit but one and allow that one to proceed to trial in order to test the legal questions on which all the actions are dependent.[74] The right to an injunction in such cases does not depend solely on the merits of the actions to be enjoined,[75] and the existence of an adequate defense or remedy at law is immaterial,[76] as the purpose of the injunction is to dispense with cumbersome and time-wasting procedure in a multitude of suits with the attendant trouble and expense to the public as well as to complainant,[77] although the bringing of several suits will not be enjoined merely for the purpose of preventing costs or expenses of separate actions.[78]

What constitutes a multiplicity of suits, such as to justify the interference of equity, cannot be determined by any fixed rule,[79] but rests within the sound discretion of the court granting the writ,[80] and, unless it is brought directly within the principle of some preceding case,[81] is to be determined from the facts and circumstances of the particular case,[82] such as in respect of the number of actions which may constitute a multiplicity.[83] The mere fact that there is a multitude of actions pending or threatened does not in itself constitute multiplicity of actions in such sense that equity will enjoin them;[84] but before several actions at law will be enjoined in order that the controversies may be determined in a single suit, it must appear that the different suits may be determined by the settlement of one or more issues of law or fact common to them all, so that a determination of one will be practically a determination of all.[85]

Each action must rest on virtually the same evidence in order to invoke equity to prevent multiplicity of suits.—Gulf, C. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Pearlstone Mill & Elevator Co., Tex.Civ.App., 37 S.W.2d 299, reversed on other grounds, Com.App., 53 S.W. 2d 1001.

It is sufficient to sustain an injunction pendente lite that all the parties to suits sought to be re-

Hardship of which applicant may complain. As a general rule the multiplicity of suits must be one to which complainant will be subject and of which he may complain.[86] An injunction should be denied where there is no showing of a necessity for, or probability that there will be, a multiplicity of suits;[87] where it does not appear that the party asking the injunction has a defense to the actions at law;[88] or where a multiplicity of actions would not be prevented by the allowance of the injunction asked,[89] as where each of the causes of action involves the determination of a separate question of fact, and the determination of one claim would not settle the issues of the other claims.[90]

Commencement or imminency of actions. Although there is some authority to the contrary;[91] in order to make multiplicity of suits a ground for interposition of a court of equity, more than one suit must have been commenced, or at least about to be begun;[92] and, under some statutes, a judicial proceeding which is pending at the commencement of the action in which the injunction is asked can be stayed by injunction only when necessary to prevent a multiplicity of such proceedings.[93]

b. Assertion of Rights of Many against One

Equity generally may enjoin numerous actions by different plaintiffs against one defendant, if the questions of law and fact involved are the same, and the various parties have the same common interest therein.

Where numerous actions are brought by different plaintiffs against one defendant, the authorities agree that equity may award an injunction for the strained are substantially the same, and that all the causes of action arose out of the same transaction, and were connected with the same subject matter.—Home Finance Co. v. Balcom, 127 P.2d 389, 61 Nev. 301.

Actions as to liability of truck owner and of insurer

Occupants of bus are entitled to have their actions against owner of truck which collided with bus speedily tried and determined, and hence such actions will not be enjoined pending determination of insurer's liability to truck owner under terms of automobile liability policy to which such occupants were not parties, particularly since insurer's rights against estoppel will be amply protected by service of notice.—Columbia Casualty Co. v. Actions on separate policies

Where insured has brought separate actions at law on separate policies against several companies insuring the same risk, it has been held that the companies are not entitled to an injunction on a bill in which they all join to restrain the further prosecution of the actions at law, notwithstanding each of the policies provides that the company shall not be liable thereunder for any more than the proportion of the loss that the amount of the policy bears to the total amount of valid insurance, since no one company has under such a contract any interest in what another company shall pay under its policy.—Mechanics' Ins. purpose of avoiding a multiplicity of suits, only where the questions of law and fact involved in the actions are the same and the various parties have some common interest therein.[94] As discussed in Equity § 42 it is difficult to make a clear statement of the nature of the relationship which must subsist between the claims of the numerous persons, in order to invoke equitable relief, in avoidance of a multiplicity of suits. According to some decisions, in order to give jurisdiction to a court of equity to enjoin numerous actions by different plaintiffs against the same defendant, it will be sufficient if the causes of action grew out of the same transaction or occurrence and the questions of law or fact in all the actions are the same.[95] On the other hand, it has been held by other decisions that merely a community of interests in the questions of law and fact involved is not sufficient, but that there must also be a common interest in the subject matter involved in each action;[96] and that it is not sufficient that the actions are based merely on the same transaction and depend for their solution on the same questions of law and fact.[97] It has been held that equity will enjoin numerous suits against the same person only where they are based on the same cause of action,[98] or causes of action that can be legally joined in one suit,[99] and will not enjoin the prosecution of separate suits by several parties against the same person, and compel them to be determined in one proceeding, if each claim is a distinct cause of action, arising out of different transactions and relating to different property.[1] An injunction will not lie to prevent numerous actions by creditors when they are seeking to reach equitable assets of the debtor, to do which it is necessary that they should obtain judgment on their claims.[2] Where, however, the creditors of an insolvent estate are numerous, the executor may file a bill to enjoin them from proceeding at law and to have the estate administered in equity.[3]

c. Assertion of Rights of One against Many

An injunction will generally lie to prevent a multiplicity of actions by one against many where the various defendants seek to litigate the same legal right and liability.

According to some decisions an injunction will lie to prevent a multiplicity of actions at law brought by one person against many where the various defendants seek to litigate the same legal right and their legal liability, if there is any, is the same;[4] but other decisions hold that a community of interest in the questions of law and fact involved is not sufficient, but that it is necessary that there should be a community of interest in the subject matter.[5]

d. Assertion of Rights of Many against Many

Equity ordinarily will not enjoin the bringing of many actions or suits by different plaintiffs against different defendants, although the grounds of action are similar in character.

A court of equity will not enjoin the bringing of many actions or suits by different plaintiffs against many different defendants, although the ground of these actions may be similar in character,[6] except where there exists a community of interest as to the questions of law and fact and as to the subject matter involved and the variety of actions or suits, if allowed to proceed, will result in a failure of justice and equity.[7]

e. Numerous Suits between Two Parties

Equity will not enjoin numerous actions by one party against another party, involving the same questions of law and fact, unless an injunction is necessary to promote justice and protect plaintiff from vexatious litigation.

Where actions brought or threatened are not in themselves vexatious and the right has not been established at law, to entitle a party to maintain a bill of peace the right claimed must be one affecting many persons, a suitable number of whom must be before the court;[8] if the right is disputed between two persons only, the bill generally will be dismissed, because as between them the first judgment might be used as a bar in all the other actions.[9] However, equity will enjoin numerous actions at law where the actions involve the same questions of fact and law, if justice will thereby be subserved;[10] but a court of equity will interfere on that ground only where it is clearly necessary to protect plaintiff from continued and vexatious litigation.[11]

f. Cause of Action Available as Set-Off or Counterclaim

An action on an independent cause of action in favor of defendant will not be enjoined, although he is entitled to use it as a counterclaim or set-off in another action in which he is sued.

In the exercise of its jurisdiction to prevent a multiplicity of suits or a circuity of actions, a court of equity will not enjoin an action on an independent cause of action at law in favor of a defendant against a plaintiff, even though such defendant may be entitled to make use of his cause of action as a counterclaim or set-off in the action which plaintiff has brought against defendant.[12]

g. Adequate Remedy at Law by Consolidation

Injunction will not be granted to prevent a multiplicity of suits where such multiplicity may be avoided by a consolidation of the actions.

Equity will not interfere by injunction to prevent a multiplicity of suits where it is possible to avoid such multiplicity by a consolidation of the actions at law, since the legal remedy is complete, certain, and adequate.[13] If, however, separate suits

Bartholomew, 132 P.2d 297, 307, 56 Cal.App. 2d 216.
Stipulation
Multiplicity of suits is not ground for maintaining bill for injunction restraining two defendants from prosecuting separate ejectment actions where one defendant expresses cannot be consolidated and remain within the jurisdictional limitations of the court in which they are brought, equity may give injunctive relief against the maintaining of the suits in such court,[14] and the interposition of equity to prevent a multiplicity of suits has also been held not to be defeated by the mere fact that in some anticipatory stage of the trial the various suits may eventually be consolidated into one cause of action.[15]

h. Award as Incidental to Jurisdiction on Other Grounds

An injunction to prevent a multiplicity of suits may be awarded as incidental to equity jurisdiction on other grounds.

Where equity has obtained jurisdiction of a case on some special equitable ground, complainant is entitled to an injunction, as incidental to his principal case, to prevent other actions on the same subject matter,[16] and if no right to relief in the principal case is shown the right to an injunction as incidental to the principal case necessarily fails.[17] Equity cannot be invoked to prevent a multiplicity of actions as an independent source of jurisdiction.[18]

i. Ascertaining Right at Law as Condition Precedent

Except where it can be justified on the ground of the great number of persons interested, an injunction to prevent a multiplicity of suits ordinarily will be allowed only where complainant has established his right at law.

Where a bill of peace cannot be justified on the ground of the great number of parties interested in common, see supra subdivisions a–d of this section, equity generally will interfere by injunction to prevent a multiplicity of suits only where complainant has satisfactorily established his right at law.[19] The rule requiring complainant to first ascertain or establish his right at law has been held inapplicable where he could do nothing to prevent the multiplication of suits, being bound by estoppel of a former judgment and at defendant's mercy except for such relief as may be given by a court of equity,[20] or where by reason of the amount in controversy there can be no appeal from a judgment in a court of law,[21] or where the actions are vexatious,[22] or, as has been held, where the systems

Reason for rule

"This presupposes that they would all be so brought, and likewise that they would all remain in court, when in truth there would be nothing to prevent the dismissal of any of the cases on voluntary motion of the plaintiff therein, and their subsequent renewal at such times and in such ways as would effectually prevent consolidation. . . . Moreover consolidated cases, involving numerous and divers questions affecting different branches of a composite controversy, cannot be so well handled in trials at law as in equity."—Dixie F. Ins. § 39. —— Vexatious Suits

Equity generally may enjoin vexatious suits, instituted for annoyance or oppression or to cause unnecessary litigation.

While there is some authority to the contrary,[24] it is generally held, whether the litigation complained of is numerous actions between the same parties or numerous actions brought by many against one, that equity may enjoin vexatious suits, not brought in good faith and instituted for annoyance or oppression or to cause unnecessary litigation.[25] Actions, however, are not necessarily vexatious because they are numerous,[26] and a clear and substantial case must be made out to authorize a court of equity to enjoin suits on the grounds that they are vexatious and oppressive.[27] One may not be enjoined from protecting and enforcing his rights by lawful means, unless his acts to that effect are done or threatened unnecessarily, not really for the purpose of protecting his rights, but maliciously to vex, annoy, and injure another.[28]

Adequacy of remedy at law. The adequacy of the remedy at law depends on whether the matter which complainant relies on as constituting his ground for an injunction can be adequately presented and adjudicated in the action at law,[32] and is as practical and efficient to the ends of justice and its prompt administration as the remedy in equity.[33]

b. Defenses Available in Actions at Law in General

Matters of defense of which complainant may avail himself in an action at law ordinarily cannot be made the ground of an injunction to restrain proceedings in such action.

Matters that will constitute a defense of which complainant may avail himself in an action pending or threatened against him cannot be made the ground of an injunction to restrain proceedings in such action,[40] unless he alleges and proves special circumstances showing that he may suffer irreparable injury if he is denied the preventive remedy,[41] such as that he was prevented from raising the defense in the action at law by fraud, accident, or mistake unmixed with any fault or negligence on his own part;[42] or unless for any reason the court of equity is a more suitable tribunal for the determination of the matter, or equitable remedies, unavailable in the court of law, are necessary.[43] A defense, however, is not regarded as adequate, so as to deprive equity of jurisdiction unless it is available in the courts of the state where the injunction is asked.[44]

Under these rules an action will not be enjoined while it is uncertain whether the court of law will entertain a defense;[45] nor will it be enjoined on grounds which constitute no defense either at law or in equity,[46] or which are not necessary to the defense of the action at law;[47] or because an accounting might be involved.[48]

Absence of grounds for action. On the ground that the defense may be made at law, an action at law will not be enjoined on the ground that the claim which it seeks to enforce is not well founded,[49] or is based on an invalid statute or ordinance,[50] or that the action is groundless or frivolous,[51] even though it is prosecuted by irresponsible parties against whom costs could not be collected.[52]

Invalidity of instrument sued on. Ordinarily an action brought on a void or voidable instrument will not be restrained.[53] Injunctive relief, however, may be granted where there is danger that the evidence of the defense may be lost by a lapse of time, inasmuch as the action at law may be terminated by a dismissal or a nonsuit,[54] particularly where the invalidity is not apparent on the face of the instrument;[55] or an injunction may be granted where the defense at law is inadequate because some equitable remedy is necessary.[56]

c. Equitable Defenses

An equitable defense is generally sufficient ground for an injunction to restrain proceedings at law, unless it is available as a defense in such proceedings.

Except where the rule is modified or abrogated by statute,[57] the existence of an equitable defense which cannot be made available as a defense in an action at law is sufficient ground for an injunction to restrain proceedings at law,[58] in which case, the court of equity will enjoin the suit at law, and will itself assume jurisdiction of the entire cause and do complete justice between the parties.[59] However, until stayed by equity the court of law can proceed according to the rules of law and does not have to dismiss the case simply because defendant seeks to set up a defense unknown to the rules administered by it;[60] and an injunction may be refused where there exists in reality no equitable defense,[61] or where defendant's own imperfect pleading is responsible for the impossibility of making the equitable defense at law.[62] So, where purely equitable defenses are equally available at law, as discussed in Actions § 57, an injunction generally will not be granted restraining an action at law because of the existence of such a defense,[63] but there is authority to the contrary.[64]

Equitable estoppel. Ordinarily an injunction will be granted on a showing of facts constituting an equitable estoppel against plaintiff in the action at law,[65] unless the facts constituting the ground of the estoppel can be made use of equally well in the action at law.[66]

Laches and statute of limitations. Although delay, along with other circumstances constituting an equitable estoppel, may be ground for an injunction,[67] generally speaking mere delay in bringing an action is no ground for an injunction against its prosecution,[68] particularly where the delay is not due to neglect or procrastination on the part of complainant,[69] or where the time fixed by the statute of limitations has not expired.[70] It has also been held that the fact that the period fixed by the statute has run is no ground for enjoining the action at law, even though the plea of the statute cannot be made available at law.[71]

Both legal and equitable defenses. Where complainant has a purely equitable defense as well as a perfect legal one, equity will usually take jurisdiction of the case, and incidentally enjoin the action at law.[72]

d. Want or Failure of Consideration

Want or failure of consideration for the contract sued on is generally no ground for enjoining the action, unless under the particular circumstances the defense is unavailable or inadequate, or a special equitable remedy is necessary to do complete justice. This rule has been applied in case of a want or failure of consideration because of the insolvency of a grantor, a defect in title, or a deficiency in the quantity of land purchased.

The mere fact that an instrument or obligation sued on at law was without consideration[73] or that the consideration therefor has failed,[74] is generally available as a ground of defense in an action at law thereon and therefore is not a ground for enjoining the action, as where one of the parties to a contract has failed to perform his part, especially in cases where land has been sold with general covenant of warranty, and later it appears that the title is defective, and the defect of title or the nonperformance can be used as a defense in the action at law.[75] Moreover, an injunction demanded on this ground will be refused where there is in fact no actual failure of consideration.[76] Where, however, under the circumstances of the particular case, the defense of want or failure of consideration cannot be availed of in the action at law, or some special equitable remedy is necessary to do complete justice, or the remedy at law is otherwise inadequate, the action at law may be enjoined.[77]

An action on a negotiable note will not be enjoined on the ground of want or failure of consideration,[78] unless the circumstances of the particular case require the interposition of equity;[79] and, an injunction will not lie against a bona fide purchaser of the note.[80]

Insolvency of grantor. In case of a breach of warranty of title the vendee must ordinarily rely on his action at law on the covenant and cannot enjoin collection of the purchase price where the grantor is not shown to be insolvent,[81] at least in the absence of fraud or concealment, on the part of the grantor,[82] or a showing that he is not within the jurisdiction of the court,[83] or of some other matter which has been discovered since the contract which would show that it would be inequitable to enforce it.[84]

Eviction under paramount title. Where there is a failure of title to the land sold, and an eviction of the vendee under paramount title and the grantor is insolvent, the vendee is not restricted to his action on the covenant but is entitled to an injunction against the collection of the purchase money;[85] but, notwithstanding breach of a covenant by total failure of title, if the vendee remains in possession he must show some equity entitling him to resort to the extraordinary remedy by injunction and one of the facts that must be shown is the insolvency of the grantor.[86]

Defect in title. A defect in title, in the absence of fraud, is generally not ground for enjoining an action at law for the purchase money where the purchaser had notice of the defect of title or adverse claim at the time of his purchase,[87] or where he has been let into possession and continued so without interruption or eviction by one holding a paramount title.[88] It has also been held that an injunction will not be granted where no suit to enforce the adverse claim has been actually brought;[89] but that the fact that such a suit is actually pending is in itself sufficient ground for an injunction,[90] whether or not the purchaser had notice of the outstanding claim,[91] although there is authority to the contrary.[92] Where, however, the circumstances connected with the acquisition of the defective title call for the application of equitable principles, in order to do justice, the purchaser may be entitled to an injunction,[93] as where the transfer of the defective title was procured by fraud on the part of the vendor,[94] or where the purchaser has taken possession under a conveyance with covenants of general warranty, and the title is questioned by a suit, either prosecuted or threatened, or the purchaser can show clearly that the title is defective, even though no fraud is shown and there has been no eviction.[95] Unless there is a fraud on the part of the vendor an actual eviction is a prerequisite to the obtaining of an injunction, and a mere threat to evict or the mere existence of a defect in the title is not alone sufficient,[96] particularly where the vendee remains in possession and does not offer to return the property.[97] If the contract of sale is unexecuted and the vendor has no title at the time he agreed to convey, equity will enjoin him from proceeding at law for the purchase money.[98]

Deficiency in quantity. Equity may enjoin the recovery of the purchase money for a tract of land on the ground of a deficiency in quantity,[99] except in case of a sale of land in gross; this, being regarded as a contract of hazard on both sides, in consequence of which the vendee is not entitled to relief in case of deficiency.[1]

e. Fraud or Mistake

Fraud or mistake with respect to the subject matter of an action at law ordinarily will not constitute ground for enjoining the action, if it is available as a complete defense thereto.

Ordinarily if an action is brought on any contract or evidence of indebtedness which has been obtained by fraud, defendant can make a good defense at law, and an injunction to restrain the prosecution of that action will not be granted.[2] Equity, however, will give relief and enjoin the action at law, if the cause of action is likely to be transferred to some bona fide purchaser against whom the defense would not avail,[3] or if for any reason the party who is liable to be sued, or who has been sued, cannot, in an action at law, present his defense as fully and effectually as he could in a court of equity, and such disability has been brought about by any fraud.[4]

Mistake. Accident and mistake constitute no ground for enjoining an action at law where, if established, they would constitute a complete defense to the action at law;[5] but an injunction may be granted where the circumstances are such that such a defense would not give adequate relief.[6]

f. Payment, Discharge, or Settlement

The payment, discharge, settlement, or release of a debt or obligation ordinarily is no ground for enjoining an action at law on the debt or obligation.

The fact that a debt or obligation has been paid, discharged, settled, or released is in ordinary cases an adequate defense at law to an action for collection or for the enforcement of the obligation, and such action will not be enjoined.[7] Where, however, the defense at law is not clearly adequate, an injunction may issue,[8] and, of course, an injunction may be proper on other equitable grounds.[9] Where a discharge that is not available at law is also unavailable in equity, no injunction will be granted.[10]

g. Set-Off or Counterclaim

A valid set-off or counterclaim is generally no ground for enjoining an action at law, unless the insolvency of the plaintiff at law or other circumstances render the interposition of equity necessary to prevent a failure of justice.

Where complainant has a valid set-off or counterclaim to the cause of action on which he is sued at law, and it is possible to avail himself of it in the action at law itself, he is not entitled to an injunction because of the set-off or counterclaim.[11] Where, however, the particular circumstances are such as to require the application of equitable principles, as where there are mutual demands between the parties which cannot be set off at law, but which a court of equity may apply in satisfaction of each of the parties, and plaintiff at law is insolvent, or a nonresident, the action at law may be enjoined and the set-off or counterclaim adjudicated in equity;[12] if the amount of the set-off is uncertain, the enforcement of the demand against which it is to be applied may be restrained until the cross demand can be liquidated.[13] It has been held that, even though the set-off is a purely equitable one, the action at law will not be enjoined unless plaintiff therein is insolvent.[14] Where an action is brought in a court of limited jurisdiction which has no jurisdiction of a claim for damages, made by defendant in that suit, the latter is not entitled to enjoin the action,[15] except in case of special circumstances, such as the insolvency or nonresidence of plaintiff.[16] Where, however, defendant in a court of law has a counterclaim exceeding the court's jurisdiction for which he must seek affirmative relief or suffer irreparable injury, he has a remedy by injunction.[17]

h. Former Adjudication

An action based on a question or issue which has been decided in a former adjudication ordinarily will not be enjoined unless it is vexatious.

After a question has once been decided in a court of competent jurisdiction a second action on the same subject matter usually will not be enjoined, because the former adjudication is an adequate defense at law.[18] A subsequent action, however, on the same question or issue which has already been adjudicated may be enjoined where, under the circumstances, it may be regarded as being vexatious,[19] notwithstanding the previous adjudication may be pleaded as a defense to the subsequent action.[20] It has also been held that a second suit may be enjoined pending the determination of an appeal from an order vacating the judgment in the first suit, claimed to be res judicata,[21] and that, after a decree in equity, an action at law for the same matter, involving the same issues, will be enjoined because of its vexing another with a double suit for the same cause of action.[22] In any event one who was not a party to the former action will not be enjoined.[23]

i. Incompetency of Witnesses to Establish Defense

The incompetency of witnesses to establish a defense to an action at law may be ground for enjoining such action, if the witnesses will be competent in a suit in equity.

Where a defendant has a perfect legal defense to an action at law, but cannot prove it for the reason that the only possible witnesses are incompetent to testify because of interest or otherwise, equity will enjoin the action at law and allow the defense to be proved in equity, if the witnesses would be competent in a suit in equity;[24] but it must be alleged and shown that the testimony sought is material to the defense and that the defendant in the suit at law is without means of proving the same facts at law.[25] However, there is authority to the effect that one will not be restrained from relying on a defense simply on the ground that those who could have rebutted it are dead or disqualified from testifying,[26] and that the fact that the rules of evidence will not permit defendant at law to avail himself of the only existing proof of his defense will not entitle him to relief in equity.[27]

j. Actions to Recover Real Property

An action relating to the recovery of real property will be enjoined only where there is not an adequate remedy at law and the facts require equitable intervention.

Actions relating to the recovery of real property will not be enjoined where there is a full and adequate remedy, or defense to the action, at law;[28] but, on the other hand, where the remedy at law is not as full, adequate and complete as may be given by a court of equity, and the facts require equitable intervention, an injunction may be obtained.[29] An action of forcible entry and detainer or of unlawful detainer will not be enjoined when complainant has a full and complete remedy or defense at law,[30] and no question of title in involved, except as it might be inextricably mixed with the right of possession,[31] unless there is fraud or mistake or a showing of manifest irreparable injury,[32] or unless the equity court has acquired jurisdiction for other purposes.[33]

Ejectment. An action of ejectment will not be restrained because of facts which constitute a good defense in that action itself,[34] at least not until the ejectment suit has proceeded to judgment.[35] An ejectment suit, however, may be restrained where the remedy afforded thereby is not as full, adequate, and complete as may be given by a court of equity, and the facts justify equitable intervention.[36] An ejectment suit by one holding the naked legal title to land will be enjoined on the application of a complainant having complete equitable title,[37] until the bill can be heard and the nature of the title declared;[38] and, on the other hand, a defendant in ejectment, holding the legal title, ordinarily cannot maintain a suit to enjoin the ejectment action.[39] An action of ejectment may also be enjoined on the ground that plaintiff in such action by his conduct estopped himself to maintain it.[40]

k. Remedy by Appeal or Certiorari

Where there is an adequate remedy by appeal or certiorari, an injunction ordinarily will not lie.

Where complainant has a right of appeal in the suit or proceeding sought to be enjoined, and the injustice complained of can be redressed on such appeal, the action will not be enjoined,[41] especially where a stay of proceedings pending the appeal can be obtained;[42] and this rule applies although complainant, because of lack of funds, is unable to take an appeal.[43] Where there is an adequate remedy by appeal an injunction will not lie to restrain actions pending in different courts merely to avoid possible conflicting decisions.[44] Injunctive relief, however, may be granted where the relief sought cannot be afforded by appeal,[45] as where, in case of several actions, an appeal is impossible without consolidation, and a consolidation cannot be had,[46] or where, under the circumstances, complainant is not called on to avail himself of the right of appeal,[47] or the right to appeal has been lost without any fault on his part.[48]

An injunction will not issue when there is an adequate remedy by certiorari;[49] it is otherwise where the remedy by certiorari is not prompt and efficient.[50]

l. Where Court Is without Jurisdiction

An action or proceeding in which the court or tribunal is proceeding without jurisdiction may generally be enjoined.

It has been held that an action may be enjoined on the ground that the court is without jurisdiction of the case,[51] but not on the ground that it may possibly exceed its jurisdiction.[52] By the weight of authority, however, where a tribunal is proceeding without jurisdiction no injunction will be granted to restrain the action, since the proceeding is void at law as in equity and the law affords an adequate remedy,[53] as where the court is proceeding without proper service of process;[54] and this rule has been held to apply to a case where the complainants in equity are strangers to the actions at law.[55]

§ 41. Actions, Suits, and Proceedings Which May Be Restrained

a. In general
b. Suits in equity in general

d. Judgment as prerequisite to allowance of injunction

a. In General

If proper grounds therefor are present, injunctive relief ordinarily may be granted as to any action, suit, or legal proceeding, even though the court at law and the court in equity have concurrent jurisdiction of the subject-matter.

55. U.S.—Quinton v. Equitable Inv. Co., Cal., 196 F. 314, 116 C.C.A. 134.

Subject to the rules discussed supra §§ 37–40, with respect to the grounds for injunctive relief, any action or proceeding at law generally may be enjoined where the grounds for such relief exist.[56] In the absence of some special equity, however, a court of equity generally will not enjoin an action or proceeding at law,[57] such as an action for tort, in which the parties are entitled to a trial by jury.[58]

Concurrent jurisdiction as affecting right to relief. In accordance with the rule that in all cases of concurrent jurisdiction the tribunal which first obtains jurisdiction of the subject matter ordinarily will proceed and finally dispose of it, as stated in Equity § 21, a court of equity, although it has concurrent jurisdiction with the court of law, ordinarily will not enjoin an action at law already pending,[59] for in such a case a court of equity will not interfere with the action, unless it can give a more perfect remedy or the case can be better tried by the procedure of that court,[60] or some special cause intervenes which renders the remedy at law inadequate,[61] as where the action involves complicated accounts which cannot be tried in a court of law with certainty and accuracy.[62] Even though the suit in equity is begun first, an injunction may be refused where the question can be tried better before a jury.[63]

An action at law brought by a state has been said not to be enjoinable.[64]

b. Suits in Equity in General

A suit in equity ordinarily will not be enjoined, unless some special equitable ground therefor exists.

As a general rule, a court of equity will refuse to enjoin a party from proceeding with a suit in equity,[65] such as a suit to obtain an injunction,[66] or an accounting,[67] or for a receiver;[68] and the rule applies whether the application is made by parties, privies, or a stranger to the litigation.[69] However, a court of equity has "power" to enjoin a party from proceeding with other equitable suits,[70] and an injunction will be granted where complainant's rights cannot be fully protected in the other suit,[71] or where the injunction is necessary to prevent a multiplicity of suits.[72] The court first acquiring jurisdiction of a case will protect that jurisdiction by enjoining an action by the same parties on the same subject matter in another court, even though that other court may also have equity jurisdiction;[73] and in accordance with this rule an injunction may issue to protect and effectuate a prior decree, and prevent the relitigation of questions of law and fact determined thereby.[74]

c. Infringement Suits

Where an infringement suit is pending, or has been decided in favor of defendant, he is entitled to an injunction restraining the prosecution of other infringement suits, with respect to the same article, against him or his customers.

In a suit against a manufacturer for infringement of a patent, the court will, on application, restrain complainant, until the determination of the pending suit, or of a similar suit pending in another court, from instituting or prosecuting oppressive and vexatious infringement suits against customers of defendant.[75] If the manufacturer is successful in the infringement suit against him, he is entitled to an injunction against the prosecution of infringement claims which were available in the earlier suit,[76] and also is entitled to an injunction restraining plaintiff from prosecuting a suit against his customer for infringement, consisting of the use or sale of the article involved in the former suit,[77] notwithstanding such a customer made his purchases indirectly through another customer of the manufacturer;[78] but he is not entitled to injunctive relief against a suit for infringement, caused by his making structural changes in the article, since the prior decree, in the direction of infringement;[79] nor is he entitled to an injunction restraining the prosecution of a suit against a customer who is a manufacturer and purchases only one part of the manufactured article from defendant in the former suit.[80] An exclusive licensee, under a patent may be enjoined, at the instance of the licensor, from prosecuting suits against infringers in bad faith and for the purpose of having the patent declared invalid, so as to release himself from his agreement as to licensing.[81]

d. Judgment as Prerequisite to Allowance of Injunction

An injunction of an action at law because of an equitable defense not cognizable at law may be refused prior to a judgment therein; and it is the common practice to require defendant to confess judgment as a condition to the allowance of an injunction in such a case.

Where an injunction is asked because of the existence of equitable defenses not cognizable at law, the court may refuse to enjoin the action prior to judgment therein, on the ground that complainant's equitable rights may be fully protected by enjoining execution of the judgment,[82] except in cases where a discovery is asked in order to assist the defense at law.[83] However, in the exercise of its discretion,[84] it is the common practice of a court of equity in granting an injunction against an action at law, to impose the condition that defendant confess judgment in that action,[85] especially where no discovery is sought in aid of the defense at law, and the matters referred to the court of equity for relief against proceedings at law are the sole ground on which the party under such rule claims right, or, in other words, where the party seeking equitable relief has no defense at law;[86] and the rule has been applied whether or not it appears that the party seeking equitable relief had a legal as well as an equitable defense to the action at law.[87] On the other hand, it has been held that, if besides the grounds of relief in equity the party has distinct and substantive grounds of defense at law, not cognizable in equity, he may, without being compelled to waive his legal defense by confessing judgment, have a hearing in a court of chancery on the merits of his case, and a decree for the proper relief.[88]

Where such a confession of judgment is exacted, the order should require execution of the judgment to be stayed and that the judgment itself be dealt with as equity may finally direct.[89] Where a confession of judgment is not exacted, on granting the injunction, the court of equity will ordinarily on dismissal of the bill and dissolution of the injunction proceed to dispose of the matters involved and render the judgment which plaintiff should have confessed,[90] or plaintiff in the action at law may introduce into his suit at law the record and final decree in the injunction suit as res adjudicata of the questions therein involved, and thus prevent defendant from relitigating these questions further in

Effect of statute
A Mortgage Moratorium Act authorizing the court to postpone the enforcement of a judgment by execution sale, or to give other relief where a judgment is rendered in an action to collect a debt or obligation secured by a mortgage, the foreclosure of which may be effected under the terms of the act, does not give an equity court power to restrain an action at law, brought by a receiver pursuant to a court order, to collect a mortgage note before a judgment on the note has been obtained.—Rea v. O'Bannon, 158 So. 916, 171 Miss. 824.

In federal courts, under new Rules of Civil Procedure, rule 18 (b), 28 U.S.C.A. following § 723c, court may grant relief by issuing injunction notwithstanding a judgment for debt has not yet been obtained, but in awarding such relief court should be guided largely by considerations which were the basis for the old rule which prohibited issuance of injunctions prior to entry of judgment, and court in proper case may make proceedings which may result in judgment be something more than mere empty form.—Reconstruction Finance Corporation v. the suit at law.[91] Where, however, the action at law is based on a contract void for illegality in which both parties participated, a court of equity will not lend its aid to enforce the illegal transaction but will merely dismiss the bill and leave the parties to work out these rights and defenses in the action at law.[92]

§ 42. —— Particular Proceedings or Remedies in Civil Actions

In the absence of special circumstances, equity ordinarily will not interfere by injunction with regular and orderly proceedings or remedies in the course of a civil action.

Except where the circumstances justify or require the granting of injunctive relief,[93] equity ordinarily will not interfere by injunction with regular and orderly proceedings or remedies in the course of an action at law,[94] as in the issuance of writs,[95] such as a writ of scire facias,[96] or in a proceeding to punish for contempt.[97] Injunction will not be granted for the purpose of changing venue,[98] unless it appears that such prejudice exists against defendant that he cannot have a fair and impartial trial in the court in which the action is pending.[99]

Introduction of evidence or taking of depositions. A court of equity may restrain the improper use of written evidence, in an action at law,[1] or the introduction of evidence obtained by fraud or duress, where in justice and good faith it should not be used against complainant.[2] A court of equity, however, is without jurisdiction to enjoin complainant in an-

Appeals and writs of error. While it has been held that a court of equity has the power to grant injunctive relief in such cases,[6] as a general rule, a party will not be enjoined from prosecuting an appeal from or suing out a writ of error to a judgment rendered against him.[7]

§ 43. —— Special Proceedings Other than Actions

Injunctive relief may be granted against a special proceeding other than an action, where proper grounds therefor are present.

In accordance with the rules discussed supra §§ 37–40, where proper grounds for injunctive relief are present, an injunction may be granted to restrain special proceedings other than actions,[8] and proceedings before a judicial officer or court of an inferior nature[9] such as a municipal court,[10] a commissioners' court,[11] a police court,[12] or a workmen's compensation court.[13] Unless proper grounds therefor exist, an injunction ordinarily will not be granted to restrain the prosecution of proceedings before an administrative board or commission,[14]

Suit to correct filing date

That appeal was barred may be shown on appeal in the case, so suit to correct filing date of petition for appeal, to show it was filed too late, and enjoin prosecution of appeal, will not lie.—Scranton Lumber Co. v. Knox, 109 So. 721, 143 Miss. 643.

Injunction granted to restrain summary warrant proceeding

(1) To recover gaming paraphernalia seized by sheriff.—Elder v. Camp, 18 S.E.2d 622, 193 Ga. 320.

(2) To recover personal property, where defendant answered interpleader and set up right to possession of property, and by cross action sought to recover the value of the property.—Gaylor v. Citizens' Automobile Co., 152 S.E. 110, 170 Ga. 91.

Application for year's support

(1) Generally a widow's application for a year's support will not be restrained.—Smith v. Pitchford, 5 S.E.2d 766, 189 Ga. 307—Kerr v. McAnally, 188 S.E. 687, 183 Ga. 365—Burks v. Beall, 3 S.E. 155, 77 Ga. 271.

(2) Executors are not entitled to enjoin prosecution of such application on ground that widow had accepted legacy in lieu of year's support or that estate had been fully administered.—Kerr v. McAnally, supra.

Settlement of estate will not be interfered with where there is a remedy at law.—Gillespie v. Schram, C.C.A.Mich., 108 F.2d 39.

13. Neb.—Massman Const. Co. v. Nebraska Workmen's Compensation Court, 3 N.W.2d 639, 141 Neb. 270.

Injunction will not be granted where the controversy is such as would be decided by equity court on grounds equally available at law or before workmen's compensation court, and therefore an employer is not entitled to injunction, restraining workmen's compensation court from proceeding with rehearing in dismissed compensation proceeding or hearing in second proceeding by claimant, as such court, in action before it, has power to do as full justice to parties and matter in dispute as can be done in equity and every matter relied on to support equitable action may be properly considered as defense in proceeding before compensation court.—Massman Const. Co. v. Nebraska Workmen's Compensation Court, supra.

Injunction not granted to restrain

(1) Employees or agents of securities and exchange commission from enforcing subpœnas duces tecum requiring telegraph companies to produce telegrams respecting matters under investigation.—Newfield v. Ryan, C.C.A.Fla., 91 F.2d 700, certiorari denied Ryan v. Newfield, 58 S.Ct. 54, two cases, 302 U.S. 729, 82 L.Ed. 563, rehearing denied 58 S.Ct. 137, 302 U.S. 777, 86 L.Ed. 601, and 58 S.Ct. 138, 302 U.S. 777, 82 L.Ed. 601, and 58 S.Ct. 262, two cases, 302 U.S. 650, 82 L.Ed. 504—Ballentine v. or to restrain the enforcement of an order or ruling of such a board or commission,[15] particularly where there is an adequate remedy by appeal from such order or decree.[16] An appeal from a tax assessment will not be enjoined, if the relief sought is defensive merely and equally available in a suit at law.[17]

Arbitration and award. Arbitration proceedings, under an agreement for arbitration, may be enjoined where proper grounds therefor are present.[18] Such proceedings, however, ordinarily will not be enjoined, unless the conduct of the arbitrators or of the parties is manifestly unlawful.[19] They will not be enjoined on the ground that some of the matters presented by one of the parties for determination are not within the contract of submission,[20] or because one of the things that the arbitrators will decide is, whether the case is one of which they should take cognizance;[21] nor will an injunction issue for the purpose of controlling the action of an arbitration board, under legislative authority, unless irreparable injury is evident.[22] Arbitration proceedings will not be enjoined at the instance of a party, to the arbitration agreement, who has, by his conduct, estopped himself from asking such relief.[23]

(2) Prosecution of appeal from award of industrial board.—Liberty Mut. Ins. Co. v. Ragan, 14 S.E.2d 88, 191 Ga. 811.

Reason for rule

"To permit judicial review . . . by injunction . . . of every procedural, preliminary and interlocutory order or ruling by which a person may consider himself aggrieved, would afford opportunity for constant delays in the course of administrative proceedings and would render orderly administrative procedure impossible. Moreover, it would result in bringing to the courts such an avalanche of trivial procedural questions as largely to monopolize their time and energies."

U.S.—Miles Laboratories v. Federal Trade Commission, D.C.D.C., 50 F. Supp. 434, 437, affirmed, C.C.A., 140 F.2d 683, certiorari denied 64 S. Ct. 1263.

Remedy at law inadequate

Where statutory provision that county commissioners' judgment or order against tax collector cited to account shall be conclusive, unless appeal is taken as therein provided, is so indefinite and uncertain or incomplete as to be nugatory and unenforceable, in absence of provision by statute for appeal, such order or judgment would not be judicial determination reviewable by certiorari, so that collector's right to appear and be heard before board in response to citation would not constitute remedy at law excluding equitable jurisdiction to enjoin commissioners from proceeding further under citation.—Bibb County v. Winslett, 14 S.E.2d 108, 191 Ga. 860.

16. D.C.—Chastleton Corporation v. Sinclair, 290 F. 348, 53 App.D.C. 373, reversed on other grounds 44 S.Ct. 405, 264 U.S. 543, 68 L.Ed. 841.

Grounds for enjoining appeal by attorney general not presented

(1) By the contention that the appeal is a nullity because not signed by attorney general or assistants and because not taken within prescribed time, since it may be determined in proceeding at law.—Edward Hines Yellow Pine Trustees v. Knox, supra.

(2) By the alleged intention of attorney general in such appeal to secure one hundred per cent assessment as against assessment of sixty per cent as to other property, since it will be assumed that the court will proceed in accordance with state and federal constitutions requiring equality and uniformity.—Edward Hines Yellow Pine Trustees v. Knox, supra.

(3) By the mere fact that preparation and presentation of defense to appeal from tax assessment will entail expense.—Edward Hines Yellow Pine Trustees v. Knox, supra.

Neglect to summon witnesses

Under a statutory provision that witnesses may be summoned to attend hearings before an arbitration committee, the neglect of one party to the arbitration agreement to summon witnesses is not a cause, after the hearing and before argument before the arbitrators, for enjoining the other party from proceeding further with the arbitration.—Dana v. Dana, 157 N.E. 623, 260 Mass. 460.

Garnishment proceedings. A garnishment proceeding may be enjoined where there are equitable grounds therefor, and there is no adequate remedy at law,[24] or it is necessary to prevent a multiplicity of suits,[25] but not merely because of annoyance by repetition.[26]

Designation of tribunal by statute as affecting right to relief. Where the legislature has specified a particular tribunal for determining a question, in the absence of some special equity, that tribunal ought not in general to be prevented by injunction from proceeding with the action or proceeding before it.[27] This rule has been applied to proceedings in courts of probate,[28] and of insolvency.[29]

§ 44. —— Mandamus, Prohibition, and Supersedeas

Injunction ordinarily will not lie to stay proceedings by mandamus or writ of prohibition, or to control the effect of a supersedeas.

While there is some authority to the contrary,[30] it is generally held that a court of equity has no jurisdiction to grant an injunction to stay proceedings by mandamus or a writ of prohibition,[31] and the effect of a supersedeas generally cannot be controlled or destroyed by injunction.[32]

§ 45. —— Discontinuance of Action or Proceeding

An injunction may be granted to restrain plaintiff from discontinuing his action or proceeding.

Under proper circumstances a plaintiff will be enjoined from dismissing his action,[33] as where an assignor attempts to dismiss an action at law brought in his name for the benefit of the assignee,[34] or where one has given a power of attorney to another authorizing the use of his name in a suit for the other's benefit,[35] and especially where such a dismissal would work irreparable injury because complainant would be barred by the statute of limitations from commencing a subsequent action.[36] However, the settlement of a suit will not be enjoined merely because creditors of plaintiff would be benefited in case its prosecution was continued.[37]

Necessity of establishing defense at law

Equity will not enjoin the prosecution of numerous garnishment proceedings against a garnishee as the debtor of a single defendant on the ground of multiplicity of actions, unless the garnishee has first established a defense at law, when equity will interfere to prevent further vexatious litigation.—Imperial Fire Ins. Co. v. Gunning, supra.

§ 46. —— Defenses

The setting up of the statute of limitations, or other matter, as a defense may be enjoined where it would be inequitable or unconscionable to permit it to be pleaded as a defense.

An injunction may be granted for the purpose of preventing a defendant in an action at law from setting up unconscionable and inequitable defenses.[38] However, a defense that would not be sustained in a court of law will not be enjoined, as the remedy at law is adequate;[39] nor will a defense be enjoined merely because plaintiff is no longer in a position to rebut it because his witnesses are dead or incompetent.[40] Moreover, it has been held that equity will not enjoin a defendant from making his defense and yet allow plaintiff to proceed in the action at law.[41]

Statute of limitations. An injunction will issue to restrain the use of the statute of limitations as a defense where it would be inequitable or unconscionable to permit it to be so pleaded,[42] as where plaintiff's failure to bring his action within the statutory period clearly appears to have been caused by wrongful or fraudulent acts or concealment on the part of defendant,[43] whether the concealment or fraud arises from the same act as the cause of action or is found in subsequent acts or failure to act.[44] A plea of the statute may also be enjoined where the delay in bringing the action was caused by defendant's procuring an injunction restraining the prosecution of the action at law,[45] or by his apparently waiving, by promise or otherwise, the benefits of the statute as a defense.[46] An injunction may be granted, although the party whom it seeks to restrain has not pleaded the statute or even stated that he intended to do so.[47] A defendant, however, will not be enjoined from pleading the statute of limitations when the delay in bringing the action was not caused by any wrongful act, artifice, or fraud on his part,[48] or by an injunction

Fraudulent instrument
Equity has jurisdiction to restrain use or assertion of an instrument purporting on its face to have a certain legal effect when the intention of parties was to the contrary and where no equities intervene to prevent equity from directing that the document be considered a nullity.—Brooks-Wright, Inc., v. Maryland Casualty Co., supra.

Wrongful use of instrument
(1) Where defendant was attempting wrongfully to assert a liability against plaintiff under a written contract, which complainant intended to sign only as agent for another, the court was not limited to affording complainant relief by reformation of the contract, but might restrain defendant from making a wrongful use of the instrument to complainant's prejudice.—Eustis Mfg. Co. v. Saco Brick Co., 84 N.E. 449, 198 Mass. 212.

(2) Where there is clear proof of a previous oral contract to which written contract can be made to conform and mistake has been made in reducing the oral contract to writing, the party prejudiced by the mistake is entitled to equitable relief, by reformation or by injunction restraining the other party from proceeding under or using the contract until the mistake has been corrected.—De Tweede Northwestern & Pacific Hypotheekbank v. since dissolved.[49]

The filing of a claim under the Workmen's Compensation Act, within the statutory period, is a jurisdictional fact, and the period is not one of limitations, the pleading of which may be enjoined.[50]

§ 47. Actions or Proceedings in Same Court

An injunction ordinarily will not be granted in one action to restrain proceedings in another action in the same court, unless full justice and relief cannot be obtained in the prior pending action.

An injunction ordinarily will not be granted in one action to restrain proceedings in the same court in another action,[51] whether at law or in equity,[52] unless it appears clearly that the full justice and relief to which complainant is entitled cannot be obtained in the prior pending action.[53]

§ 48. Actions or Proceedings in Other Courts

An action or proceeding in another court may be enjoined where the circumstances warrant such relief.

As explained in Courts § 498, one court may restrain parties from proceeding further in another court in the same state, as where the former, but not the latter, court possesses the requisite jurisdiction, or where the courts have concurrent jurisdiction but the exercise of jurisdiction by the former is prior in time. On the other hand, proceedings in one court should not be enjoined by another court in the same state, where there is want of power or jurisdiction to grant the injunction, as where the proceedings sought to be enjoined are in a court having exclusive jurisdiction thereof, or where the courts have concurrent jurisdiction but the court whose proceedings are sought to be enjoined has previously acquired jurisdiction, or where there is lack of grounds for granting the injunction. In accordance with these principles, and subject to the rules regulating the grounds for an injunction of an action or legal proceeding, as discussed supra §§ 37-40, an action or proceeding in another court in the same state may be enjoined only where the circumstances justify an injunction,[54] as where the suit or proceeding in the other court is subsequent in time and is for substantially the same relief,[55] or where the claim or controversy has been finally determined by the court issuing the injunction,[56] or where the action or proceedings in the other court involve an adjudication of the same subject matter,[57] although it also involves parties not common to both actions[58] or a different cause of action which the injunction does not purport to affect.[59] Where the proper grounds therefor exist, an injunction may issue to restrain proceedings in a court in another county,[60] or from a higher court to restrain proceedings in a lower or inferior court,[61] even though such proceedings are prior in time,[62] as where the lower court has only partial jurisdiction of the claim or controversy the proceedings therein may be enjoined in order that the entire controversy may be tried in a higher court which has jurisdiction thereof.[63]

§ 49. Actions and Proceedings in Other States or Countries

An action or proceeding in another state or country generally may be enjoined on the ground that it interferes inequitably with local litigation affecting local citizens or residents, evades the law of the local state, or otherwise requires the interposition of equity to prevent manifest wrong or injustice.

A court of one state or country, which has acquired jurisdiction of the parties, has power, on proper cause shown, as discussed in Courts § 554, to enjoin them from proceeding with an action in another state or country, particularly where such parties are citizens or residents of the state, or with respect to a controversy between the same parties of which it obtained jurisdiction prior to the foreign court; but this power should be exercised sparingly, and not unless a clear equity is presented requiring the interposition of the court to prevent manifest wrong and injustice.

In accordance with these principles, and subject to the rules relating to grounds for restraining an action or proceeding generally as discussed supra §§ 37–40, an action or proceeding in another state will be enjoined, even though complainant has made a general appearance therein,[64] where it is made to appear that its prosecution will interfere unduly and inequitably with the progress of local litigation or with the establishment of rights properly justiciable in the local court,[65] will subject complainant to fraud, gross wrong, or oppression,[66] to

As to parties temporarily in sister state
Where a controversy between residents has been determined by the courts of a state, and, while one of the parties is temporarily in a sister state, an action is commenced against him there by the adverse party, involving matter previously determined, an injunction will be granted restraining the adverse party from prosecuting the suit in the sister state.—Oates v. plainant in either state,[77] that the case involves some equitable element which the courts of the state where the suit is brought cannot apply,[78] that the action or suit is contrary to the statutes[79] or the public policy[80] of the state in whose courts the injunction is sought, or that the injunction is necessary to prevent a multiplicity of suits.[81]

Evasion of law of domicile. An injunction of this character may be granted to prevent a citizen of one state from prosecuting an action against another citizen of the same state in a foreign jurisdiction, for the purpose of avoiding the laws of his own state,[82] whether the law sought to be evaded is one of legislative enactment[83] or of judicial decision,[84] and whether plaintiff has other legal defenses available in the court in which the action is brought.[85] An injunction may be granted to restrain an action brought by a creditor in another state for the purpose of securing a preference and to evade the insolvency law of the domicile[86] or to restrain him from resorting to a foreign administration for the purpose of evading the distribution of the property of the estate through a local administration.[87]

Insufficient grounds for injunction. The courts of one state will not enjoin the bringing or prosecution of an action in another state where the parties seeking the injunction can obtain full and adequate relief in the court in which the action is brought;[88] where, on balancing the convenience and inconvenience likely to result to the different parties, it appears that the questions involved can be more conveniently litigated in the courts of the other state[89] or the injunction would operate oppressively, inequitably, or contrary to the real justice of the case;[90] where the court in which the

Failure to intervene

An injunction will not issue to restrain the prosecution of an action pending in the court of another state to nullify or set aside a judgment rendered in that state, in the absence of a showing by complainant that he has been denied the right by the foreign court, to intervene in the action, or that justice will not be done therein.—Guggenheim v. injunction is asked would be unable to enforce the writ if granted;[91] or where the right to relief is at most doubtful.[92] An injunction will not be granted merely because complainant prefers to have the matter adjudicated by his own courts,[93] or there is some distrust of the courts of the sister state,[94] or from considerations of mere inconvenience or expense,[95] particularly where the action in the foreign state is first commenced, and the court has jurisdiction of all the parties;[96] nor will it be granted on the ground that complainant will be deprived of the privilege of examining an adverse party before trial[97] or that a large number of witnesses reside in the state in which the injunction is asked, making it necessary to take their depositions.[98]

It also is not ground for an injunction of an action in another state that the court in which the injunction is asked recognizes different rules of law and practice and procedure from those which obtain in the state where the action is brought;[99] that the decision of the court in which the action is brought may differ from that of the court of the domestic state[1] or from those of other courts of equal authority;[2] that the party bringing the action in the other state might obtain some advantage by so doing;[3] that the party asking the in-

Hope of larger verdict
In suit to enjoin defendant from prosecuting action brought against plaintiff in New York under federal Employers' Liability Act, the fact that defendant brought her action in New York rather than in Massachusetts, where accident occurred and defendant resided, merely because of the hope of a larger verdict, was not a "fraud" on plaintiff and did not indicate an intent merely to harass or annoy plaintiff for purpose of forcing a settlement, and the difference in procedure and the possibility of a larger verdict in New York did not warrant an injunction.—Boston & M.

junction has good reason to apprehend a less favorable result for himself in the court where suit is brought;[4] that plaintiff in the action sought to be enjoined might fail because there is no merit in his case;[5] that it would be impossible to take the jury to view the premises where an accident occurred;[6] or that the attorney of plaintiff in the action sought to be enjoined procured his employment by unprofessional methods which would call for a disbarment in the state where the injunction is asked,[7] although such conduct may be considered with other circumstances in support of the injunction.[8]

§ 50. Restrains Litigants, Not Courts

An injunction against an action or legal proceeding operates only in restraint of the parties thereto, and is in no sense a restraint on the court itself, and does not prevent it from proceeding with the action or proceedings.

An injunction granted to stay proceedings in a court of law operates only in restraint of the parties to the proceedings, and is in no sense a prohibition on the action of the court or tribunal itself,[9] since the court of equity asserts no supremacy over the court of law, but the injunction virtually admits and assumes the jurisdiction of the latter.[10] Likewise an injunction granted at the instance of a private citizen, restraining a judge, duly commissioned by the governor of the state, from discharging his judicial functions, is wholly unwarranted,[11] unless he is disqualified, as for bias.[12] A proceeding to enjoin a prosecution for contempt in another court,[13] or to prevent the execution of an order of such court punishing for contempt, will not be entertained.[14]

While there are some decisions which maintain the contrary doctrine,[15] the better opinion is that the court in which the action sought to be enjoined

Reason for rule

In injunction suit, equity court acts in personam and, in exercising its power to restrain judicial proceedings in other courts or tribunals, proceeds, not on any claim of right to interfere with or control courts in such proceedings or prevent them from adjudicating parties' rights duly presented for their determination, but on theory that equity court, having jurisdiction of persons of those involved, may compel them to do or refrain from doing whatever equities of case require.—Massman Const. is pending may proceed despite the injunction, in case the enjoined party chooses to brave the consequences of committing a contempt by disobeying the order,[16] and the judgment of the court of law will be valid just as though no injunction had ever been issued.[17] However, if the attention of the court is properly called to the fact that a party has been enjoined from proceeding, it will usually not permit the party to disobey the injunction, and will stay the proceeding out of respect for the court issuing the injunction.[18]

As against attorney. An injunction restraining the prosecution of an action states no substantial relief against the attorney bringing the action, since the action remains, although the attorney is enjoined.[19]

the decision of that action,[25] where the judgment in that action will not conclude the rights of complainant and he will suffer no injury,[26] or where he may become a party to that action and protect his rights therein.[27] The fact that a defendant has appeared in an action at law and pleaded thereto does not deprive him of his right to an injunction against the prosecution of that action.[28] When an injunction is sought as ancillary to an action at law, suit must be brought by the same plaintiff in the same capacity.[29]

B. PROPERTY, CONVEYANCES AND INCUMBRANCES

§ 52. In General

Property rights are appropriate subjects of injunctive relief, subject to the general rules as to the necessity of irreparable injury and inadequacy of a legal remedy. As in other injunction suits, grant or refusal of relief rests in the sound discretion of the court and cannot be based on conjecture or doubtful facts. Injunction however is not as a rule a proper remedy for the recovery of possession.

Injunctions may be properly employed to protect rights of property,[30] however great or small, complicated or simple,[31] and no matter by whom

As against widow's application for support

Persons claiming, by virtue of title under wills of third persons, real estate which widow sought to have set apart for her year's support, could not enjoin prosecution of the application for year's support, since such persons would not be bound by the year's support procedure as respects any subsequent claim of title by widow or her assignees.—Smith v. Injunction held proper

(1) To protect musician's performance by restraining the broadcast of phonograph records made thereof.—Waring v. WDAS Broadcasting Station, Inc., 27 Pa.Dist. & Co. 297, affirmed 194 A. 631, 327 Pa. 433.

(2) To restrain installation and operation of gasoline tank at instance of nearby property owner whose consent, although required by ordinance, had not been obtained.—Jennings v. Calumet Nat. Bank, 180 N.E. 811, 348 Ill. 108, affirming 262 Ill.App. 189.

(3) To protect sponge plants and other property placed in tidal waters, when rights of others would not thereby be violated.—Perky Properties v. Felton, 151 So. 892, 113 Fla. 432.

(4) To enjoin the digging of clams on public property to which clams had been shifted by a severe storm from adjoining property on which the clams had been planted by a private corporation.—Robins Island Clam Co. v. Gaffga, 8 N.Y.S.2d 969, 170 Misc. 862.

(5) To protect property rights with respect to the handling of cotton.—Anderson, Clayton & Co. v. State ex rel. Allred, 62 S.W.2d 107, 122 Tex. 530.

(6) To enjoin mortgagor from changing status of mortgaged property and from withdrawing funds deposited with clerk of court as security for certiorari bonds.—Butters Mfg. Co. v. Sims, 174 S.E. 623, 178 Ga. 775.

(7) To protect other property rights.—Pickron v. Phillips, 160 S.E. 615, 173 Ga. 407.

Rights not protected by injunction

(1) The right of an automobile driver to use the streets of a city is not a property right of such importance as to warrant a court of equity in interfering to preserve it against enforcement of a valid statute, ordinance, or police regulation.—Godfrey v. Ray, 124 So. 151, 169 La. 77.

(2) Passengers using jitneys acquire no vested property right in such method of transportation entitling them to enjoin the city from discontinuing granting jitney licenses.—Davis v. City of Houston, Tex. Civ.App., 264 S.W. 625.

(3) A retail liquor license is not property within the rule that equity can issue restraining orders to protect property rights, since if license is validly revoked the privilege of selling expires and if the order of revocation is invalid, the privilege of selling continues, and if criminal proceedings are brought on ground of legal revocation, defendant has an adequate remedy at law in a defense that he was selling under a license which was in legal effect.—State ex rel. Scope of protection generally invasion of such rights is attempted.[32] Property rights will be protected by injunction against acts which will result in great or irreparable injury,[33] or which are continuous or repeated,[34] and against which relief could otherwise be had only by a multiplicity of suits.[35] Particularly will injunction issue against unlawful interference with property by acts which are intentional[36] or tortious,[37] and which are accompanied by malice[38] or by coercion and intimidation.[39] The owner of property may have injunctive relief to restrain officers from seizing the property, without a search warrant, on the ground that it may contain evidence to be used against a third person accused of an offense.[40]

Property rights subject to protection by injunction include not only ownership and possession of property, but also the right to its use, enjoyment, and disposition.—Dallas Land & Loan Co. v. Garrett, Tex.Civ. App., 276 S.W. 471.

The grant of an injunction to protect property rights rests in the sound discretion of the court,[41] and the facts on which the court is called to act should not be of doubtful or uncertain nature, or based on conjecture.[42] The applicant for relief must show not only the existence of his property right but also that the acts sought to be restrained will violate such right,[43] and as in other cases, considered supra § 26, he must be willing to do equity.[44] Injunction should not be made a vehicle for invading the legitimate province of government or a means of establishing a system of rules for the regulation of the business of a community.[45]

Adequate legal remedy. The jurisdiction of equity to protect by injunction legal rights and interests in property is based on the inadequacy of the remedy at law and the jurisdiction is never exercised where the remedy at law is ample and complete.[46] On the other hand, equity will intervene by injunction to protect property rights where no

Purchase and foreclosure of mortgage

Bill alleging that plaintiff purchased from defendants realty subject to mortgage created by defendants, relying on false assurances of defendants that realty was in good condition, that plaintiff spent money to make repairs which defendants had agreed to make, that mortgagee was threatening to foreclose the mortgage, and that defendants were endeavoring to purchase the mortgage in order to obtain possession of the realty, presents no facts sufficient to warrant injunction against defendants to restrain them from purchasing the mortgage and from obtaining the realty by foreclosure, or relief from foreclosure under statute.—Herriman v. Lowe, supra.

Payment of rent

Injunction has been refused at the instance of a tenant to restrain the landlord from causing the issuance and execution of a writ of restitution in possessory proceedings, the injunction being sought on the ground that the tenant had acquired paramount title, where the tenant made no offer to pay rent for the period prior to the time he acquired paramount title.—Clark v. Injunction for recovery of possession. sion,[56] it is very generally held improper to issue a preliminary injunction, the effect of which will be to compel the transfer of property from one litigant to another.[57] Where defendant has taken forcible or fraudulent possession of property, or suddenly and secretly changed an existing status to secure an unfair advantage pending a dispute, a preliminary or temporary injunction of mandatory character may issue for the protection of plaintiff's rights.[58]

One who is out of possession cannot as a general rule obtain a mandatory injunction to dispossess another in peaceable possession of the property, pending an adjudication of the relative equities of the parties as to the right of possession.[59] As otherwise expressed, it is not the function of an injunction to transfer the possession of property, particularly lands, from one person to another pending an adjudication of title or the right of possession.[60] This rule, however, has exceptions,[61] and injunction is granted in extreme cases of pressing necessity where complainant shows himself entitled to the interference of a court of equity and is without adequate and practical remedy at law,[62] or in cases where the possession has been forcibly or fraudulently obtained by defendant and the equities require that the possession thus wrongfully invaded be restored and the original status preserved pending the decision on the issue as to title or right of possession.[63]

Wrongful seizure of corporate records

Persons who, claiming to be duly elected officers of funeral corporation, were in possession and management of funeral home when others under claim of authority as officers unlawfully entered home, took corporation's records, and withheld them by force and threats, were entitled to temporary injunction to require disturbers of possession to restore status quo of business and property pending trial.—Houston Funeral Home v. Boe, Tex.Civ.App., 78 S.W.2d 1091.

Possession of decedent's estate acquired by trespass

Where widow took possession of property in possession of administrator of deceased's estate, through his tenant, under circumstances that constituted a trespass, a temporary injunction mandatorily requiring widow to restore property to administrator, and, pending final deposition, to desist from intruding into any other property belonging to the estate, was proper as maintaining, rather than disturbing, the status quo pending trial.—Story v. Story, Tex.Civ.App., 172 S.W.2d 753, reversed on other grounds, Sup., 176 S.W. 2d 925.

§ 53. Complainant's Right or Title

a. Necessity
b. Sufficiency
c. Deraignment of title

a. Necessity

Injunctive relief as to property is not available to one who has no title to, or interest in, the property, plaintiff being required in this respect to stand on the strength of his own right rather than on the weakness of his opponent's.

Injunctive relief with respect to property will not be granted to one who does not have title to, or possession of, the property, or some interest therein, such as a right of possession,[64] and the party seeking the injunction must stand on the strength of his own right or title rather than on the weakness of the right or title claimed by his opponent.[65] Complainant must show at least a fair prima facie case in support of the right or title he asserts,[66] and clearly a party who holds the legal title to property and is entitled to its possession will not be enjoined at the instance of one who has neither title nor the right of possession.[67]

Possession incident to employment
The asserted right of an individual to maintain his office and home on college premises as incident to his position as president of the college is not an interest in realty subject, as such, to equitable protection. —Bressler v. Board of Trustees of State Colleges, 21 A.2d 559, 67 R.I. 269.

General creditor
The fact that defendant is indebted to plaintiff in some undisclosed amount and has some articles in stock and some funds against which plaintiff, although asserting some sort of claim, in fact has no claim, does not warrant an injunction prohibiting defendant from exercising control over the stock and funds.—Junkin v. Sterchi Furniture Co., Tex. Civ.App., 92 S.W.2d 1098.

Defendants' right shown in complainant's chain of title
Complainant could not restrain defendants from removing shrubbery and the like from strip of land where evidence showed defendants' title to use of strip was recognized in deed to complainant's grantor.—Campeggi v. Wakefield, 145 A. 546, 157 Md. 229.

Prior unabandoned possession
To put defendant on proof of his own title or require him to negative any unlawful character of his possession, a plaintiff seeking to enjoin cutting and removal of timber must show either a prior unabandoned possession in himself or such prior possession of a predecessor in title; and in the latter event he must show prior possession of such predecessor and a deed from him to plaintiff or to some one under whom plaintiff claims while the grantor was in actual possession.—Payne v. Comparative good faith immaterial Plaintiff's right to an injunction does not depend on the good faith of his claim as compared with that of defendant, or on the fact that there is no merit in defendant's claim of title, but on the validity of his own title.—Phillips v. Alma Coal Co., C.C.A.Ky., 7 F.2d 42, certiorari denied Alma Coal Co. v. Phillips, 46 S.Ct. 483, 271 U.S. 669, 70 L.Ed. 1142.

Ownership by third person
One seeking to enjoin defendant from procuring a patent to land can succeed only by establishing his own title to the land, and not by showing that the land was appropriated and owned by some third person.—Ramsey v. Hughes, 280 S.W. 99, 212 Ky. 715.

Use of land to park automobiles
An automobile dealer was not entitled to an injunction preventing a village from interfering with his practice of parking automobiles on strip of land between improved portion of street and railroad right of way where he did not claim or show any right, title, or interest in the strip, since he could not prevail by virtue of the weakness of title of the village.—Plummer v. Village of Swanton, 15 N.E.2d 349, 133 Ohio St. 623.

Vendor retaining title and possession under contract
Where vendor and purchaser entered into written contract for sale of realty on which oil and gasoline station was located, and vendor was to retain title and to operate the station for the purchaser until the purchase price was paid, purchaser, before payment of purchase price, could not enjoin the vendor from going on the premises and exercising control over the premises merely because the purchaser was dissatisfied with the way that the vendor was conducting the business.—Farmers Union Oil Co. of Epping v. Kilgore, supra.

Devisee entitled to property pursuant to a decree in equity will not be enjoined, at the instance of a person in possession of the property, from enforcing an execution for possession, where there are no facts requiring a review of the equity decree or showing that the devisee is not entitled to possession.—Frechette v. Thibodeau, 200 N.E. 538, 294 Mass. 51.

b. Sufficiency

Injunctive relief as to property is not limited to persons having title or sole ownership; and lawful possession or a right of possession may be protected under the circumstances. Such relief may be granted to a life tenant, remainderman, reversioner, mortgagee, lessee, licensee, or one holding an equitable interest.

Subject to the rule denying injunction where the respective rights of the parties are doubtful or in dispute, as considered infra § 54, injunctive relief to restrain injury to, or interference with, property will ordinarily be granted to plaintiff whose right or title is superior to that of defendant,[68] even though plaintiff is out of possession;[69] a fortiori, injunction will lie at the instance of one who not only has a clear legal title but who also is in actual possession of the property involved.[70] It is not indispensable, however, that complainant show title,[71] and one in possession of land, although not having title, may as a rule maintain injunction to restrain interference with the property,[72] at least if such possession is rightful[73] or is bona fide and under claim or color of right or title.[74] On the other hand, unauthorized possession of property, without any title or right of possession, will not be protected by injunction,[75] and thus one who is in effect a mere trespasser will not be aided by an injunction in preserving the fruits of his wrongdoing,[76] as by restraining the party who was in possession from resuming his lawful occupation which was taken from him by the trespasser;[77] and

Employer

Injunction may be had to put an employer owner in possession of land as against one who is his mere employee, and not a technical lessee. —Lathem v. Odell, 142 S.E. 558, 166 Ga. 187—English v. Little, 139 S.E. 678, 164 Ga. 805.

One in possession of realty who has constructed improvements thereon may enjoin interference by a rival claimant who shows no better title, notwithstanding both parties fail to prove ownership by their muniments of title.—Meyer v. Pockros, 18 Ohio App. 506.

Owner under federal patents

Plaintiffs establishing legal title to land under federal patents were entitled to an injunction against trespasses against defendants who claimed ownership based on squatters' possession, where thirty years had not elapsed from the time the land left the public domain to the date of the filing of the injunction suit.—Pavell v. Berwick, D.C.La., 48 F.Supp. 246.

Purchaser under oral contract

Injunctive relief against the cutting and carrying away of timber from land can be had by one who has contracted orally for the purchase of the land, where the vendor has never attempted to rely on the statute of frauds but has, on the contrary, executed a deed in accordance with the oral contract.—Bodkin v. Merhew, 7 Ky.Op. 547.

Vendor's possession under agreement of sale

An agreement for the sale of property on installment payments, providing that the vendor should retain title to the property, improvements, and crops, that purchaser's possession should be deemed that of the vendor, and that purchaser would surrender possession on default in making payments, gives the vendor a sufficient possession and right of possession to entitle him to injunctive relief after default by the purchaser, the purchaser's status under the agreement being merely that of cropper.—Union Central Life Ins. Co. v. Audet, 21 P.2d 53, 94 Mont. 79, 92 A.L.R. 571.

Grant of land and "appurtenances"

One who has received a grant of land "with the rights and appurtenances thereto," and who has taken possession of and used a pipe line on the land, has a sufficient interest therein to enjoin its removal by one who has no title.—Westbrook v. Hagaman Refining Corporation, Tex. Civ.App., 282 S.W. 826.

Tax lienor

The lien of the holder of a certificate of purchase at a tax sale will support an action to restrain the removal of buildings from the land; but the remedy is waived as to buildings where, after their removal, the tax purchaser obtains a judgment for their value against those who removed them, which is declared a lien on the buildings.—Phillips v. Myers, 7 N.W. 580, 55 Iowa 265.

Title immaterial as concerns trespasser

Where complainant is in peaceable possession of the property, it is immaterial, so far as concerns a trespasser who interferes with such possession, in whom the title is vested. —Zierath v. McCann, 129 P. 808, 20 Cal.App. 561—32 C.J. p 131 note 44.

Uninterrupted possession for long time

School district in uninterrupted possession of an athletic field or playground for thirty years could enjoin a continued trespass although it did not have title to the property. —Frailey Tp. School Dist. v. Wetzel, 29 Pa.Dist. & Co. 607.

the fact that the interests and operations of the trespasser are large and the damage to the owner is small is of no importance.[78] A mere technical right to the possession of property has been held insufficient to warrant an injunction against the owner of the beneficial interest in the property who was in actual possession.[79]

Under some statutory provisions, one possessing real property for more than a year, whether he may be the real owner or not, may protect that possession by injunction.[80] Under statutes of this character the sole question involved is that of possession, as considered infra § 58, and title is not in issue.[81] Protection is afforded under this statute to one who has been in possession for the required period, notwithstanding such possession has been disturbed, although not lost.[82]

Sole ownership is not essential to entitle complainant to an injunction to restrain injuries to property,[83] or to restrain a total dispossession of him from the property.[84] On the other hand, a right held in common with the public is not sufficient to justify the issuance of an injunction.[85]

Life estate. One who owns a life estate in land is entitled to an injunction against unlawful interference with his possession through unfounded claims.[86]

Remainder or reversion. A reversionary or remainder interest is in general sufficient to entitle complainant to an injunction against injury to the inheritance.[87] However, an injunction will not be granted where plaintiff's interest to be protected is a contingent remainder, very remote and almost beyond the realm of possibility, and to grant relief would inflict great hardship on the parties against whom it is sought;[88] nor will it be granted to enjoin the use of real estate by the owner thereof, at the instance of one whose contingent interest in the property can never defeat the fee.[89]

Mortgage. A mortgagee has sufficient interest to enjoin the removal of timber from land where it constitutes the principal value of the land.[90]

Lease. A lessee, or his assignees or successors, has such an interest as entitles him to an injunction to prevent irreparable injury to his leasehold estate.[91] This rule applies only in favor of those who have valid leases,[92] and a subtenant who seeks equitable relief to protect his rights to the leased premises must clearly show that he is in lawful possession of such rights.[93]

An easement may be protected by injunction at the instance of the owner thereof, as is considered in Easements § 107 b.

Possession held not lost
Where a person disturbs such possession and brings suit involving the property, a reconventional demand, showing that defendant has had possession of the land for more than a year, and that he had been disturbed in that possession less than a year previous, is in effect a possessory action and constitutes notice to the disturber that possession of the other was not lost but merely disturbed.—Slack v. Reversion in land conveyed for church purposes
One who has conveyed land to a church subject to a reservation of oil and mineral rights, and also subject to a reversion in the event that the land should cease to be used for church purposes, has such an interest in the premises as to be entitled to an injunction restraining trustees of the church from using the premises as a burial ground.—Phipps v. a third party.[94] However, persons given a license to enter on lands to cut and remove timber have been held not owners in acreage of such lands, within the meaning of statutes relating to the formation of drainage districts so as to permit them to maintain an action to restrain a drainage district from cutting and destroying the timber.[95]

An equitable interest in property is in general sufficient on which to base a suit for an injunction.[96] This doctrine has been applied in proceedings to enjoin waste,[97] trespass,[98] or a wrongful sale,[99] and in proceedings to quiet title.[1] Where the right of a tenant to a crop maturing after the expiration of his lease is equitable and rests on an equitable estoppel, a court of equity has jurisdiction to protect by injunction the equitable interest of the tenant.[2]

A warrantor of title who has no other interest in land cannot maintain a bill for injunction to quiet possession, unless he seeks also an account and other equitable relief.[3]

Trustees and other representatives. Provided a trustee or other representative has qualified and is properly acting as such,[4] he may sue to enjoin acts prejudicial to the estate which he represents.[5]

c. Deraignment of Title

There is some conflict as to whether an applicant for injunction must deraign title from the state; but it has been held unnecessary to show title back of a common grantor under whom all parties claim. Relief may be based on a title acquired by adverse possession, although under some statutes an applicant who lacks a perfect paper title must establish certain facts which a party having a perfect title need not.

There is authority for the view that one relying on legal title as a basis for injunction must deraign title from the state;[6] but deraignment of title back to the sovereign has been held unnecessary in the case of one holding conveyances, and possession thereunder, for a great many years.[7] Where both parties claim under a common grantor, it is not necessary to show title back of such common grantor,[8] although the mere fact that both parties claim under a common grantor does not dispense with the necessity of showing that plaintiff has acquired title or an interest from the common grantor.[9] By virtue of statute, the nature of plaintiff's title, as to whether or not it is a perfect paper title, may affect the necessity of establishing the insolvency of defendant or the irreparable character of the injury.[10]

10. In Georgia

(1) Where plaintiff shows a perfect title, an injunction may be granted against the cutting of timber or boxing or working it for turpentine without proof that defendant is insolvent or that the damages would be irreparable.—Payne v. Nix, 17 S.E.2d 67, 193 Ga. 4—32 C.J. p 144 note 58 [b] (1).

(2) Where plaintiff has not a perfect title, insolvency or irreparable injury must be alleged.—Wiggins v. Middleton, 43 S.E. 432, 117 Ga. 162—32 C.J. p 144 note 58 [b] (2), (3).

(3) Although plaintiff may not have perfect title, an injunction may nevertheless issue to restrain the cutting of timber where damages would be irreparable or where the trespass is a continuing one.—Anderson v. Thompson, 15 S.E.2d 890, 192 Ga. 570.

(4) If plaintiff, although failing to show a perfect paper title, shows a good title, he may be entitled to an injunction not only if the injury is irreparable or defendant insolvent, but also if other circumstances exist which, in the discretion of the court, render the injunction necessary and proper, such as the avoidance of circuity and multiplicity of actions or the impossibility of proving the amount of damages growing out of the trespass.—Payne v. Nix, supra—32 C.J. p 144 note 58 [b] (3)-(5).

(5) A perfect title within the meaning of the foregoing rules means a title based entirely on papers capable of being recorded and requiring no extraneous evidence to supply or cure defects.—Payne v. Nix, supra—32 C.J. p 144 note 58 [b] (6), (7).

(6) Plaintiff seeking to enjoin cutting and removal of timber failed to make out his case on the theory of a perfect paper title and thus was not relieved from showing that defendants were insolvent, where one of the deeds in his alleged and proved chain of title was from an alleged "sole heir at law" of deceased predecessor in title, since parol evidence was necessary to prove that essential fact.—Payne v. Nix, supra.

Adverse possession. One who has acquired title by adverse possession may protect his possession by injunction against the commission of trespass es thereon.[11] Injunctive relief against interference with possession will not be afforded to one who has no title to the property and whose only relationship to the property is possession acquired under circumstances such that no prescription could arise therefrom;[12] but one claiming under a purchase of land from the holder of the legal title, with full payment of the purchase money, is not required to show such paper title and possession thereunder as would ripen into prescriptive title to defeat another's suit for injunction against interference with the land.[13]

A complainant holding possession of land adversely to defendant has been held entitled to enjoin defendant from trespassing where defendant did not file a cross bill in ejectment to recover on the strength of his legal title.[14]

§ 54. —— Title or Right Doubtful or in Dispute

The right or title to property must ordinarily be clear to warrant its protection by injunction, since this remedy is not appropriate to determine a disputed title or right of possession of property, particularly where an adequate remedy at law is available, as, in the case of realty, by ejectment or trespass to try title, or, in the case of personalty, by replevin.

Ordinarily, injunction is not a proper remedy, as an original and independent proceeding, for the trial and establishment of a disputed title to, or right of, possession of property,[15] real[16] or person-

Boundary fence
Suit will not lie to enjoin interference with the construction of a fence where the real issue concerns a disputed boundary line.—Kateiva v. Snyder, 254 P. 857, 143 Wash. 172.

Logging
Injunction will not lie to restrain the operation of a logging railroad where there is a controversy founded in good faith as to plaintiff's title to the land on which the railroad is situated and the alleged injury is not irreparable, it being against the policy of the law to interfere by preliminary injunction with industries and enterprises that tend to develop the country and its resources.—John L. Roper Lumber Co. v. Coppersmith, 131 S.E. 575, 191 N.C. 217.

Interference with driveway
Title cannot be tried in a suit to enjoin a neighbor from extending a building over that part of a driveway which lies on his land, thereby destroying the use of the driveway for automobiles.—Charles Market v. Heinockowitz, 137 A. 96, 5 N.J.Misc. 463.

Disputed rights under lease
(1) Where lease by plaintiff was not for exact quantity of land, and had no definite boundaries, and evidence conflicted as to boundaries and whether defendant's cultivation would include any part of leased premises, there was no error in refusing temporary injunction to prevent defendant from cultivating land adjacent to houses on lease.—Trudie Turpentine Co. v. Pearson, 125 S.E. 862, 159 Ga. 387.

(2) Subtenants seeking an injunction to protect their rights to the leased premises were not entitled to relief where it appeared that the landlord, a railroad company, under the terms of the original top lease, had the right to terminate the lease when it desired possession of the premises for railroad, and the showing on affidavits and counter affidavits was insufficient to establish that the railroad did not want to use the premises for railroad purposes.—Wilson-Broadway Building Corporaal,[17] and hence the right or title of one seeking equitable relief by injunction to protect his property must ordinarily be clear or admitted.[18] Thus, where title or the right of possession is in dispute between two parties, one of whom is in actual possession under a claim or color of right, injunction will not, as a rule, lie to transfer possession to the other party.[19] Particularly will injunction be refused to determine an issue as to ownership or the right of possession of land where an adequate remedy at law is available, as by ejectment or trespass to try title;[20] and similarly with respect to personalty, the general rule is that, when the right or title to personal property of ordinary character is in dispute and such right or title is a strictly legal one, the remedy of the party out of possession is not by suit in equity for injunction but by an action at law, such as replevin, in which he establishes his ownership or right of possession.[21]

Use of hospital rooms

A county having possession of all except two rooms of a hospital building has been held not entitled to an injunction giving it possession of the two rooms as against a physician claiming the right to possession of such rooms under a contract with the county.—Head v. Commissioners' Court of Hutchinson County, Tex. Civ.App., 14 S.W.2d 86.

Abandonment and nonuser

Injunction will not lie to restrain an employee of a state department from occupying property, possession of which was legally obtained by the department under a lease with plaintiff's predecessor in title, where plaintiff claims, and the department denies, that it has abandoned the premises and lost its rights by nonuser.—Cannon v. Montgomery, 192 S.E. 206, 184 Ga. 588.

Pendency of proceedings before federal agency

(1) Court had no jurisdiction to enjoin alleged trespass on real property during pendency of proceedings before United States General Land Office for determination of character of land in controversy, in absence of showing that party asking for injunction was in undisputed or rightful possession of land.—Steele v. Allison, 73 S.W.2d 842, 228 Mo.App. 656.

(2) A corporation claiming a right to possession of government land has been held not entitled to a permanent injunction against a party asserting a conflicting claim, pending final action on an application under a prospecting permit for the issuance of an oil and gas lease by the department of interior.—Alaska Development Co. v. Brannan, 275 P. 115, 40 Wyo. 106.

Lessee seeking possession

(1) Injunction will not be granted to a lessee who is out of possession in order to permit him to obtain possession from the owners of the property who have obtained possession peaceably and under claim of their right of ownership.—Sinclair Refining Co. v. Cole, 294 N.W. 884, 229 Iowa 763.

(2) A lessee who is not in possession and whose right to possession has not yet matured is not entitled to a temporary injunction restraining the lessor from leasing the property to someone else or putting someone else in possession, where the lessor has already entered into a lease with a third party who is in possession and the lessee is thus seeking to alter, and not maintain, the status quo.—Eastern Farms Products v. Wampsville Dairymen's Corporation, 17 N.Y.S.2d 954, 173 Misc. 413.

Possession under prior injunction

Injunction will not be granted against one in possession of land under a prior injunction, which was concededly proper, while such prior injunction continues in force, since the new injunction, if granted, would have the effect of transferring possession.—Queen v. Swink, 131 S.E. 324, 134 S.C. 21.

Other remedy available to landlord

Injunction will not lie by a landlord to oust a tenant from possession of the leased premises where the landlord has an adequate legal remedy under unlawful detainer statutes or otherwise.

Administration of realty by administrator

One claiming title to realty sought to be administered by an administrator cannot test his title to the land by a suit to enjoin the administrator from administering the realty as the estate of decedent, an action for land or a suit in ejectment being the appropriate remedy.—O'Quinn v. McClelland, 199 S.E. 128, 186 Ga. 750.

§ 55. —— Establishment of Title or Right

a. General rules
b. Limitations and exceptions

a. General Rules

The general rule is that a disputed right or title must first be established at law before it can be made the basis of injunctive relief, particularly where the acts sought to be enjoined would not cause irreparable injury and there is no emergency.

Since injunction is not a proper remedy for the trial of issues as to title or right of possession, as considered supra § 54, equity will not, as a general rule, interfere to protect legal rights in property or to transfer possession from defendant to complainant until complainant has established his title or right by an action at law,[22] at least where such title or right is in doubt or is disputed.[23] Particularly will injunction be refused before complainant's right or title as to the property has been established at law, where such right or title is not clear or established prima facie, or has not been long enjoyed, and the injury threatened is not irreparable or the remedy at law inadequate.[24] In any event, equity will not interfere before the disputed right or title has been established at law in the absence of some emergency.[25] Injunction will not lie where the principles of law on which the right depends are doubtful and have not been adjudicated by a court of law;[26] nor will it lie where complainant has previously attempted and failed sion of personal property held by a sheriff under writ of sequestration in a suit involving its title and possession, since, if the state owns the property, it can, through its officers charged with its possession and custody, recover it by using the statutory remedy of a trial of the right of property, or possibly by bringing an independent suit for its recovery.—State v. Houston Nat. Bank, Tex.Civ.App., 259 S.W. 175.

Suspension of injunction until decision at law

Where defendant is in possession of land and claims adverse title under verified allegations sufficient to show a colorable claim, he has a right to have the injunction case suspended until the decision of paramount title is had at law, particularly if the alleged encroachment constituting irreparable injury has been completed before the application for injunction.—Southern Ry. Co. v. City of Greenwood, D.C.S.C., 40 F.2d 679.

Who must prosecute at law

In a suit to enjoin the erection of a building on an alleyway over which plaintiff claims an easement, where plaintiff's rights are in dispute, the proper practice is to require that plaintiff, not defendant, prosecute a suit at law to test title.—Metaxas v. Easton Pub. Co., 140 A. 603, 154 Md. 393.

In New Jersey

(1) Where the fundamental right under which the complainant prays equitable relief is based on the alleged existence of an easement in lands of another, and the existence thereof is in substantial dispute between the parties, the establishment of the right at law is necessary to justify the interference of a court of equity.—Rockaway Rolling Mill v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co., 143 A. 334, 103 N.J.Eq. 297, affirming Rockaway Rolling Mill Corporation v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co., 137 A. 650, 101 N.J.Eq. 192—Borough of West Long Branch v. Hoch, 131 A. 889, 99 N.J.Eq. 356, reversing 138 A. 106, 99 N.J.Eq. 103.

(2) Under the Chancery Act of 1915, P.L. p 184, where complainant's right or title is raised in an injunction suit equity sends the parties to the law court for the determination of the question of title but meanwhile retains, and does not dismiss, the bill.—Rockaway Rolling Mill Corporation v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co., 137 A. 650, 101 N.J.Eq. 192, affirmed 143 A. 334, 103 N.J.Eq. 297—Sayre & Fisher Land Co. v. R. U. Rue Co., 128 A. 862, 2 N.J.Misc. 1081.

(3) However, it has been held, without reference to the statute, that where equity has no jurisdiction of a suit to restrain the obstruction of a roadway because the question of the existence of an easement has not been settled at law, it is proper to dismiss the bill for lack of equity if a motion is made therefor, although if such motion has not been made the proper course for equity is to retain the bill until complainant has had a reasonable opportunity to establish his title by a suit at law.—Borough of West Long Branch v. Hoch, 131 A. 889, 99 N.J.Eq. 356, reversing 138 A. 106, 99 N.J.Eq. 103.

in an action at law to establish his title.[27]

Ordinarily equity will interfere by injunction to restrain continuing trespasses where complainant's title has been settled at law;[28] but the mere fact that complainant's right has been established at law is not always sufficient to warrant an injunction against repeated trespasses, the application being addressed to the court's discretion and its grant or refusal depending on the circumstances and character of the threatened injury.[29]

b. Limitations and Exceptions

(1) In general
(2) Clear or prima facie right or title
(3) Irreparable injury

(1) In General

Injunctive relief is sometimes granted, in the discretion of the court, before establishment of the right or title at law, as, for example, where a multiplicity of suits is thereby avoided, or where title is involved only collaterally or incidentally, or where the parties without objection form issues to try title in the injunction suit; and the necessity of first establishing title at law is obviated by the statutes in some jurisdictions.

A dispute as to a legal right to property does not in every case defeat the jurisdiction of equity to grant injunctive relief without a prior adjudication at law,[30] for notwithstanding some dispute as to the asserted right, it is within the discretion of the court whether it will entertain a bill to enjoin a continuing trespass before the right has been established at law.[31] A court of equity may proceed and define the right without remitting the case to a court of law where a multiplicity of suits will thereby be avoided.[32] Injunction is sometimes granted when title is only collaterally involved or is merely incidental to the main action,[33] although, conversely, it will not be granted where ownership and the right to possession are the real issues and the equitable issues are merely incidental.[34] Title to real property may be tried in suit for injunction where the parties frame the issue for that purpose and no objection is made.[35] It has been held that as the owner of a merely equitable title to real estate cannot sue in a court of law for vindication thereof or redress of wrongs done to it, he may resort to equity for injunctive relief, under circumstances warranting such relief, even though his title is disputed.[36]

Public domain will be protected at the instance of the government without the title being first established at law.[37]

Refusal of injunction for absence of power held error

In a suit to restrain a former county employee from entering on county property and residing in a dwelling thereon which he formerly occupied in connection with his employment, it was held error to refuse an interlocutory injunction solely on the ground that the chancellor could not grant such injunction until a jury decided the issues of fact made by the petition and answer.—Marion County v. Avoidance of five separate suits

Where five landowners adjoining a railroad right of way all claimed title to rails and other property which railroad's assignee intended to remove, a separate suit at law against each landowner solely to determine the issue of law involved, no facts being in dispute, was an inadequate remedy, and assignee was entitled to an injunction restraining landowners from interfering with removal.—American Steel & Iron Co. v. Ground for equitable jurisdiction

Where there is some stated ground for equitable jurisdiction to restrain trespasses, the mere fact that there is involved in the case a controversy as to boundary lines will not oust the court of jurisdiction.—Cullen v. Ksiaskiewicz, 118 N.W. 496, 154 Mich. 627.

Ancillary proceeding

A husband who had homestead rights in property of his deceased wife, and brought suit in trespass to try title to the property, could resort to immediate relief of mandatory injunction in a proceeding ancillary to the suit to try title, as a method of obtaining possession from a claimant to the premises, the husband's legal remedy being inadequate to protect his homestead rights.—White v. Reason for rule

"Perhaps one reason why equity courts have in such cases consented to take jurisdiction where the dispute between the parties involves title to real estate is because the respondent has not been deprived of a trial by jury, by requiring him, over his objection, to litigate the dispute in a court of equity."—Talbot v. depends entirely on the construction of instruments of title which would not lend itself to submission to a jury.[38] On the other hand, a prior adjudication at law has been held required where the right sought to be protected depends on the meaning of an ambiguous and uncertain contract,[39] deed,[40] or will.[41]

Statutory exceptions. Under the statutes of some states an injunction may be issued without the title of the party being first established in a suit at law.[42] Thus, under some provisions parties in possession may be relieved of establishing their title at law before bringing suit to restrain waste and trespass.[43] The title, if in dispute, and the equitable remedy may be determined in the same action.[44]

(2) Clear or Prima Facie Right or Title

A right or title to property may be protected by injunction without its prior establishment at law where such right or title is admitted or where, notwithstanding a formal denial, it is clear from the facts; and such relief may also be afforded where complainant makes out a strong prima facie case of right or title, or a right enjoyed over a long period of time without interruption.

The establishment at law of a right or title to property is not a prerequisite to injunctive relief where such right or title, or the material facts on which it is based, is admitted;[45] nor is prior adjudication at law necessary where it appears from the pleadings, evidence, or otherwise, that the right is in fact clear and certain,[46] notwithstanding a formal denial of complainant's right or title.[47] As otherwise expressed, where the legal right, although formally disputed, is clear on facts which are not denied and legal rulings which are well settled, equity will protect such right by injunction.[48] The interposition of a court of equity in such cases must be based on a clear and certain right to the enjoyment of the subject in question, and an injurious interruption of that right which on just and equitable grounds ought to be prevented.[49]

It has been held in a number of decisions that where complainant makes out a strong prima facie case of right or title, the injunction will be granted without a previous trial at law.[50] Thus where right has been enjoyed by complainant for a long period of years, its violation will be enjoined without the right being first established at law;[51] and where defendant's possession is not exclusive and is but an interruption of the prior open and notorious peaceful possession of complainant, an injunction will be allowed before the right is determined at law.[52] Equity has jurisdiction, without a prior adjudication at law, to enjoin and restrain defendant from the cutting and moving of timber from the land or otherwise trespassing thereon where both

In Maryland, a court of equity has express statutory authority, whenever a question of law appears which might conveniently be decided before evidence is offered, to pass an order directing the question to be raised for the opinion of the court, and hence, while it is proper for the chancellor to send questions of title to a court of law for trial, a permanent injunction may be granted at once if complainant's title is clear.—Smith v. parties claim title and have exercised acts of ownership for a long time, but defendant bases his alleged right on adverse possession and fails to make out even a prima facie case.[53]

(3) Irreparable Injury

It is generally considered that injunctive relief is proper to protect property before right or title thereto has been established at law where the threatened injury would cause irreparable damage and destroy the inheritance or the substance of the estate.

An exception to the general rule requiring a disputed right or title to be settled at law before injunction will issue occurs where the threatened trespass goes to destroy the inheritance or the substance of the estate,[54] as in mining coal or other minerals, or cutting trees,[55] or where the damage would be otherwise irreparable;[56] at least injunctive protection in such cases is afforded to one in rightful possession of the property,[57] although with respect to a complainant out of possession seeking injunctive relief against mining or the cutting of timber it has been held that there must first be an adjudication of his title at law[58] or an action at law for that purpose either pending or contemplated and ancillary thereto.[59]

§ 56. —— Protection pending Litigation as to Title or Right

a. In general
b. Possession and use of property
c. Sale, transfer, or removal of property or funds

a. In General

Injunction may be granted to preserve property in statu quo pending establishment of the right or title thereto at law, in equity, or by special proceedings. Relief of this nature rests in the discretion of the court, the relative inconvenience to the parties being the important factor; and the party seeking relief must show some probability of success in the main action.

The protection of property from damage or destruction pending litigation is an established head of equity,[60] and injunction may be granted to preserve property and property rights in statu quo until a final adjudication of the right or title to the property,[61] relief of this nature being available pending a suit in equity,[62] an action at law,[63] or Wakefield, 145 A. 546, 549, 157 Md. 229.

Purpose of injunction
Injunction is granted in such cases in order either that the property may still remain subject to the orders of the court or that some wrongful act that would tend to render the court's final judgment ineffectual may be prevented.—Rogers v. Daniel Oil & Royalty Co., Civ.App., 105 S.W.2d 476, affirmed 110 S.W.2d 891, 130 Tex. 386.

Relief obtainable elsewhere
A showing that the same relief might be obtained in some other forum will not prevent the grant of an injunction where the granting of the injunction is merely ancillary to the main action and is for the purpose of protecting property later to be disposed of by the court.—Smith v. Monroe, Tex.Civ.App., 1 S.W.2d 858, error dismissed.

special proceedings,[64] such as quo warranto,[65] condemnation proceedings,[66] or a contest before the land department.[67] The court does not undertake to settle the right, but merely to preserve the property until the right is settled at law,[68] or until the main case is disposed of on the merits;[69] and the injunction should not give either party an undue advantage.[70]

The party seeking the protection of equity for his property must show that irreparable injury will result from the invasion of his legal right, and that such irreparable injury is likely to be sustained before the legal right on which the application for injunction is founded can be fully vindicated in the proper forum.[71] The injunction sought must be in protection of some right being litigated in the main action and will not be granted where it is not germane to the subject of such action.[72] A court of chancery will decree an adverse claimant to deliver possession to the owner only when such relief is incidental to the main object of the bill, and when the power of the court has been called into action for some purpose that belongs to its legitimate jurisdiction.[73] A perpetual injunction against trespass cannot be granted in aid of an ejectment suit where it appears that the ejectment suit has been terminated and, according to the judgment entry in the suit, determined adversely to the party seeking the injunction.[74]

Discretion of court. The right to injunction to preserve the status quo in property pending litigation as to title or right is for the trial court to determine in its discretion,[75] although, where a proper case is made for the allowance of such an injunction, it is an abuse of discretion to refuse it.[76] The court, in exercising its discretion will be largely guided by the relative inconvenience which would result from granting or refusing the relief.[77]

Probability of success. An injunction to preserve the status quo will ordinarily be granted where there appears to be a substantial question between the parties and a reasonable ground to believe that complainant may ultimately be successful in his claim;[78] but it need not clearly appear that complainant will ultimately succeed, it being sufficient if he makes out a prima facie right.[79] However, the dispute must be based on something more than a mere unsupported claim asserted by plaintiff,[80] and an injunction should not be granted where a reasonable possibility of success is not shown.[81]

Pending appeal. The unsuccessful party in an action at law may be granted an injunction where it appears that otherwise there will be such a change in the status of the subject matter of the controversy as may render nugatory the judgment of the court of review, when announced.[82] On the other hand an injunction will be denied if the injury will be insignificant,[83] or the remedy at law adequate,[84] or if it does not appear that irremediable mischief, going to the destruction of the substance of the estate, is being done or threatened,[85] or if complainant has seemingly acquiesced in defendant's right and allowed him to make great expenditures,[86] or if appellant fails to show a prima facie right,[87] or if the statutes provide a remedy.[88] Pending an appeal from a decision dismissing a bill for an injunction an injunction will not be granted or revived.[89]

b. Possession and Use of Property

One in possession of property under a claim of right may protect such possession by injunction pending litigation as to his right, particularly where transfer of possession would cause irreparable injury. Conversely, a complainant out of possession may not have possession pending adjudication of the rights of the parties except in unusual cases, such as those in which possession was taken from him forcibly or fraudulently.

One in possession of land under a claim of right or title which is not merely colorable may maintain a suit for an injunction to protect his possession pending litigation as to the right or title to the property,[90] at least when dispossession would result in irreparable injury, or where the remedy at law is inadequate;[91] and, as ancillary to a suit in equity, an injunction may be granted to protect possession, in cases in which complainant would be entitled to the relief if ultimately successful.[92] Ordinarily a defendant in possession will not be enjoined from the use of the property in controversy, or the exercise of acts of ownership or acts which are the ordinary incidents of possession, at least where it does not appear that complainant will thus lose the fruits of his pending action if he establishes title.[93]

c. Sale, Transfer, or Removal of Property or Funds

Injunction may be had to restrain the sale or removal of property, or the disposition of funds, during the pendency of litigation as to the right or title thereto, where there is danger that the litigation would otherwise be rendered futile.

Where the main suit is pending in equity, the court, as ancillary thereto, will grant an injunction to prevent the sale, transfer, or any change in the status of the property which will interfere with the equitable adjustment of the rights of the parties on final decree.[94] Also, pending an action

32 C.J. p 127 note 15.
Injunction against conveyance or at law an injunction will be granted against a sale or disposition of the property in controversy where it is necessary to prevent irreparable injury,[95] or a multiplicity of suits.[96] The cutting and removal of timber on land may be restrained pending litigation as to the right to the land and timber;[97] and thus creditors may restrain heirs from cutting and carrying away timber pending a creditors' bill to subject the real estate of deceased debtor.[98] An injunction restraining the removal of property should not be granted where the injunction would operate to enforce a penalty or forfeiture.[99]

The effect of the doctrine of lis pendens does not prevent the granting of an injunction restraining the alienation of property pending litigation,[1] although it has been frequently held that such an injunction is not necessary or proper where property is affected by lis pendens,[2] and the courts have required other grounds for the granting of an injunction, such as a showing of irreparable injury.[3]

Protection of funds. Equity may by a restraining order protect a fund in controversy, pending the determination of the controversy, where there is danger that the fund will be lost or dissipated and that complainant will lose the fruit of his action,[4] or where the fund is in the court's possession.[5] In these circumstances, an injunction may be granted to preserve the fund and secure it for the party to whom it may be adjudged to belong on final decree.[6] In an action against a corporation and individual defendants, an injunction to restrain distribution of the corporate assets pending the determination of the action, on the ground of the insolvency of the corporation, will not be granted where it does not appear that the individual defendants are insolvent and that a judgment against them could not be enforced.[7]

§ 57. Trespass or Other Injury to Real Property

While the jurisdiction of equity to restrain trespass is well settled, it should be exercised sparingly and ordinarily is confined to cases where the nature of the property or the frequent repetition of the trespass precludes recovery of remediable damages at law. Lawful acts may not be enjoined even if they cause injury to complainant's realty.

The jurisdiction of equity, in a proper case, to restrain trespasses is now well settled,[8] and privity of title is no longer essential to the right to an injunction.[9] Any unauthorized entry on the lands of another may be such as to evoke the equitable disposition of property generally see infra §§ 72–74.

Pending suit to set off cross judgments jurisdiction of the courts,[10] and injunction will lie in an otherwise proper case to prevent a threatened trespass.[11] However, injunctions to restrain trespass do not issue as a matter of course;[12] there may be inconsequential trespasses which a court of equity will not enjoin,[13] and the jurisdiction is to be exercised sparingly,[14] and ordinarily is confined to cases where from the very nature of the property affected or the frequent repetition of the trespass the injury sustained is not susceptible of remediable damages.[15] As against a mere trespasser, an outstanding equitable interest will not defeat the right to an injunction.[16]

Lawful acts. The lawful act of a defendant may not be enjoined merely because it results in injury to complainant's realty.[17] An entry made under authority of law may not be enjoined as a trespass.[18]

§ 58. —— Persons Entitled

Ordinarily possession is essential to injunctive relief for trespass or other injury to real estate, but some authorities permit such relief in an otherwise proper case where complainant is out of possession but the injury threatened is irreparable.

Subject to requirements affecting right or title, as discussed supra §§ 53–56, it may be stated generally that in an otherwise proper case injunction lies to protect the rights of one in possession of real estate,[19] but that a suit to enjoin trespass or other injury to realty may not as a rule be maintained by one lacking actual or constructive possession thereof.[20] So, in the absence of statute per-

Constructive possession
Where land claimed by plaintiff was on steep hillside which was little used, plaintiff's constructive possession of land by virtue of title in absence of actual exclusive possession by defendant was sufficient to maintain action to enjoin trespass.—Connecticut Light & Power Co. v. mitting it, ordinarily an injunction will not lie to prevent interference with realty by defendant in possession.[21] Relief may, however, be granted in an otherwise proper case where by reason of the trespasses or other injuries the damage will be irreparable and recovery of damages would be an inadequate remedy,[22] although even under such circumstances some authorities have held that a complainant out of possession must first have his title adjudicated, as discussed supra § 55 b (3). Where trespasses are continuous and create irreparable injury, the court will allow a temporary injunction whether complainant or defendant is in possession, the object being to preserve the property until the rights of the parties can be determined.[23] Certain other exceptions to the rule may also arise where questions of right and title are involved, as discussed supra §§ 53–56.

Where no one is in possession of land, it has been held that plaintiff's lack of possession will not bar his securing injunctive relief against a defendant entering on the land for unauthorized purposes.[24]

Statutory provisions. Under statutes providing that one in actual and real possession of property for more than a year may protect the property by injunction, one fulfilling such statutory requirement may enjoin trespass or other injury.[25] Under a statute providing that one in actual and material possession of realty within a year preceding the filing of suit may by injunction retain or recover possession from another, a complainant put into possession within the year by writ of execution may maintain suit for injunction.[26]

§ 59. —— Establishment of Title

The necessity for establishing title or right as a basis for seeking injunctive relief has been considered supra § 54.

Examine Pocket Parts for later cases.

§ 60. —— Adequate Remedy at Law

Injunctive relief against trespass or other injury to land will not be granted where the plaintiff has an adequate remedy at law.

The inadequacy of the remedy at law is the basis of the jurisdiction in cases of trespass,[27] and it is elementary law that equity will not interfere to prevent the commission or continuing of trespasses where full and ample relief can be obtained at law.[28] Where the resulting injury is susceptible of perfect pecuniary compensation, the remedy by injunction will be denied in the absence of other grounds calling for equitable interference.[29]

Naked trespass. Equity will not restrain by injunction the commission of a mere ordinary or naked trespass; the nature of the trespass or the injury resulting therefrom must be such as to require equitable interference.[30] Where the trespass is single, fugitive, and temporary, adequate compensation can be obtained by an action at law, and there is no ground to justify the interposition of a court of equity;[31] and it has been held that, in case of a mere naked trespass, jurisdiction is not conferred by the mere fact that defendant is insolvent.[32] However, a very important limitation of this rule is recognized by some decisions in which it is held that, regardless of the inadequacy of the remedy at law, equity will restrain a trespass by one admittedly without right who proposes to take the law into his own hands to accomplish his purpose.[33] It has been held that a mandatory injunction will issue to compel one to remove from land where he is admittedly without claim or right thereto either in law or in equity,[34] and this is true even though the injury is not serious or oppressive and is readily compensable in damages.[35]

§ 61. —— Inadequate Remedy at Law

An injunction will lie, as a rule, in cases where the legal remedy is inadequate, as where the injury cannot be measured by pecuniary standards or where damages will not fully compensate the complainant for trespass or other injury to his realty.

Where a trespass or other injury to land is of such a nature that there is no adequate legal remedy, it may be enjoined,[36] as where the injury is of such a nature that it cannot be fully compensated in damages,[37] or cannot be measured by any certain pecuniary standard.[38]

Criminal trespass. The fact that a trespass to real property may also constitute a crime does not affect the power of the court to grant an injunction.[39]

§ 62. —— Multiplicity of Suits

Equity may enjoin trespass on land where necessary to avoid multiplicity of suits.

In the exercise of its jurisdiction to prevent a multiplicity of suits, as discussed generally supra §§ 24, 38, a court of equity will in a proper case enjoin a trespass where a multiplicity of suits would be required to compensate the injured person in damages.[40] If the injury is continuous, and remediable at law only by a multiplicity of suits, it can well be regarded as an irreparable one calling for the interference of equity by the exercise of its restraining powers;[41] and in these circumstances it is not essential to the jurisdiction of a court of equity that defendant should be insolvent.[42]

§ 63. —— Insolvency of Trespasser

Insolvency of the defendant is not alone a ground for granting an injunction to prevent trespass or other injury to real estate of the complainant, but it is a factor for consideration and may, in combination with other factors, afford ground for injunctive relief.

Insolvency of the trespasser may afford an additional ground for the granting of an injunction to restrain a trespass,[43] particularly in cases of repeated or continuing trespasses.[44] For instance, an insolvent trespasser may be enjoined from removing a growing crop[45] or from cutting timber.[46] Insolvency of the trespasser, however, will not of itself give chancery jurisdiction to enjoin a trespass.[47] It is one element to be weighed but it is not of itself decisive.[48] If there are other sufficient means of preventing the commission of the threatened trespass,[49] or no such pressing injury or danger in delay as calls for an injunction,[50] none will issue. Where the main object of suit is to settle title, an injunction to restrain a trespass will not be granted merely because of the insolvency of defendant.[51]

§ 64. —— Repeated or Continuing Trespasses

a. In general
b. Basis of jurisdiction

a. In General

The general rule permits injunctive relief for repeated or continuing trespasses, even in cases where the damage is nominal and no single trespass causes irreparable injury.

Although the interference of courts of equity by injunction to prevent repeated trespasses is of comparatively modern origin and was formerly confined to cases of waste by parties with privity of title,[52] it is now well settled that an injunction will lie to restrain acts of trespass which are continuous or constantly recurring where irreparable injury will result, unless they are restrained,[53] and the court will award all the relief that the nature of the ac-

and the owner of property will be protected in its enjoyment whether that enjoyment is one of sentiment or a pecuniary one.[61] Except in the special cases provided for by law, one person cannot take the property of another without his consent or continually trespass on it and compel the owner to accept payment of money in satisfaction, especially where the threatened trespass will result in depriving complainant of the enjoyment of a property right.[62]

Where the continuous character of the trespass is not sufficiently shown, injunctive relief may be denied,[63] and the rule that equity will interpose to prevent a continuing trespass or to enjoin parties who are disturbing the peaceful possession and quiet enjoyment of the owner of land has no application in favor of one who has acquired his possession by force and entering upon the prior possession of another.[64]

Trespass not one ab initio. A court of equity may restrain a continuing trespass notwithstanding it was not a trespass ab initio.[65]

Consideration of equities between parties. Where a mandatory injunction is asked requiring restitution of the property to its former condition, the right to it must depend on a consideration of the equities between the parties.[66]

Consideration of comparative injury. In determining whether an injunction shall issue in case of a continuing trespass the courts ordinarily will not apply the rule of comparative injury;[67] but, as is shown infra § 67, circumstances may be such that the application of this principle is proper.

b. Basis of Jurisdiction

Aside from the irreparable character of the injury, an injunction to restrain repeated or continuing trespasses may be based on inadequacy of legal remedy, avoidance of multiplicity of suits, or prevention of acquisition of an easement by continued trespass.

As stated supra subdivision a of this section, continuous trespasses occasioning irreparable injury may be enjoined. The principal reason, other than the prevention of such injury, assigned as a basis for an injunction is that the remedy at law for damages is inadequate.[68] An action for damages is inadequate where the damages can be estimated only by conjecture and not by any actual standard,[69] or where the amount cannot be adequately established, as discussed supra § 25, or where, if the damages may be readily assessed, the expense of a recovery will exceed the nominal amounts recoverable for each of the successive trespasses.[70] It has been said that, where the damages from a continuing trespass are substantial, the injured person may obtain an injunction as a matter of right.[71] The fact that the legal remedy may be adequate for each individual trespass, when considered by itself, does not make such remedy adequate for the continuous course of trespasses and the entire wrong may be enjoined.[72] In this connection it has been said that while a remedy at law might be adequate for each single act, if it stood alone, yet where repeated acts are done or threatened an injunction will lie to prevent a multiplicity of suits,[73] and many decisions base the right to injunctive relief for continuing trespass on the ground of avoidance of multiplicity of actions.[74] However, it has been held that the court will not interfere on the ground of avoidance of a multiplicity of suits where the bringing of one or many suits is a matter for complainant's election and there is no necessity for a multiplicity;[75] and there are decisions to the effect that a multiplicity of suits within the meaning of this rule arises only when different persons assail the same right and not when repeated trespasses are committed by the same person.[76]

Preventing acquisition of easement. The general rule is that an injunction may be granted to restrain a continuous trespass which, if persisted in, would ripen into an easement,[77] or to restrain a use in excess of an existing easement,[78] and this is true although the immediate damage inflicted is not appreciable.[79] The court will generally interfere even by mandatory injunction to compel the trespasser to undo as far as possible what he has wrongfully done;[80] but this rule is not rigid and there are some exceptions to it.[81] Injunctive relief has been denied for a continuing trespass which might ripen into an easement where the threatened injury was deemed remote and contingent because of the extended period of time which would have to elapse before the trespass could ripen into an easement, and where there was a statutory legal remedy available to protect complainant's rights.[82] The grant of injunctive relief to protect the owner of the servient estate against acquisition or excessive use of an easement is discussed in Easements §§ 103, 107, and the issuance of injunctions to protect the owner of an easement is considered in Easements § 107.

§ 65. —— Permanent Occupation or Injury

The authorities agree that irreparable injury, such as destruction of the inheritance, affords a basis for issuance of an injunction restraining trespass or other injury to real estate; but they disagree as to whether or not irreparable injury is an essential factor to support such an injunction.

It is well settled that if the bill shows that irreparable injury will result from a trespass a sufficient ground for the interference of equity by injunction to restrain its commission or continuance is made out.[83] Some authorities state broadly that a showing of irreparable damage is essential to the grant of an injunction for trespass to realty,[84] but other authorities state that it is not necessary to

Giving notice

Where it appeared that defendant had used a private alley of complainant's continuously for eight years, and that if he continued so to use it without interruption for another twelve years the trespass would ripen into an easement, the court denied injunctive relief because the danger of acquisition of an easement was both remote and contingent, and because under an existing statute relating to easements complainant could prevent such acquisition by giving a notice provided for by the statute. It also appeared that the use occasioned no present, applicable damage.—Hart v. Hildebrandt, supra.

find that plaintiff will suffer irreparable injury as a basis for the issuance of such an injunction.[85] A remote possibility of damage is, however, insufficient basis for injunctive relief;[86] and it has been held that equity may refuse to enjoin defendant's use of land where damage is avoidable only at a cost so prohibitive as practically to deprive defendant of the use of his own property.[87]

Destruction of the inheritance. The rule is well settled that when the injury goes to the destruction of the inheritance, it is irreparable, and the trespass will be enjoined,[88] and this is so regardless of defendant's solvency,[89] or of the small value of the property,[90] and even though, as discussed supra § 55 b (3), the title to the premises may be in dispute. Furthermore, it has been held, in limitation of the general rule stated supra § 58, that a plaintiff out of possession will be denied injunctive relief against a defendant in possession, and that one out of possession claiming title may seek the aid of equity to enjoin acts which will work a destruction of the inheritance.[91] The injury may consist in the destruction of that on which the value of the estate depends, or in the destruction of the estate in the character in which it has been enjoyed.[92]

§ 66. —— Cutting or Removal of Timber

a. In general
b. Rights of purchaser of standing timber

a. In General

Ordinarily injunction will issue against the continuous cutting or removal of timber, as in the case of ornamental or other trees especially valuable under the facts of the case, and the basis of equitable jurisdiction has been placed on the grounds of irreparable injury, inadequacy of legal remedy, and avoidance of multiple actions. Insolvency of the defendant is not essential to maintenance of suit for injunction in such cases, and possession of plaintiff, while ordinarily necessary, is not always required.

The rule has been laid down broadly in many decisions that continuous cutting of timber is a trespass of such character as will be enjoined by a court of equity;[93] and the right to an injunction is not affected by the solvency of defendant.[94]

Applying the general rule that continuous cutting of timber is an enjoinable trespass, it has been held that the destruction of ornamental, shade, and fruit trees, and ornamental shrubbery, is an injury going to the destruction of the inheritance which may be enjoined;[95] and injunctions have frequently been granted where it appears that the trees are necessary to the enjoyment of the property in the particular character in which it has been used,[96] or that the cutting defeats the purpose for which the trees are being grown,[97] or that the chief value of the land consists in the trees, the cutting of which is sought to be prevented,[98] although there is also authority to the contrary of this proposition.[99] The injunction has, however, been refused in some cases on the ground that it did not appear that the trees had any particular value;[1] but there is likewise contrary authority.[2]

Possession as prerequisite to injunction. A plaintiff in possession of the land may enjoin the trespass of another engaged in cutting timber thereon.[3] In accordance with the general rule stated supra § 58, ordinarily it is necessary for plaintiff to be in possession and defendant out of possession in order to warrant the issuance of an injunction to restrain defendant from the cutting and removal of timber;[4] but special circumstances may arise under which a plaintiff out of possession may seek the aid of equity to enjoin defendant from such action.[5]

Basis of jurisdiction. The basis of the jurisdiction according to many decisions is that trespasses of this character amount to a destruction of the inheritance,[6] within the rule stated supra § 65, and that irreparable injury results from destruction of the property right incident to unauthorized cutting of timber,[7] so that pecuniary compensation for damages is not deemed an adequate remedy.[8] As a general rule irreparable damage must appear as a ground for an injunction against the cutting or removal of timber,[9] but under some circumstances such an injunction may be granted without proof of irreparable injury.[10] The nature of the property involved and the inconvenience of suing for continuing trespasses also constitute a basis for equitable relief,[11] as well as avoidance of multiplicity of actions.[12]

Prior possession of predecessor
In suit to enjoin cutting and removal of timber and for other relief, plaintiff could not recover on his mere prior possession where the only possession proved was that of an alleged predecessor in title, and that was long before the execution of the deed from that predecessor.—Payne v. Nix, 17 S.E.2d 67, 193 Ga. 4.

Possession within rule
(1) A respondent in a suit to enjoin his removal of timber who had gone into possession under a contract purporting to give him the right to cut the timber as well as the right of ingress and egress on the land, together with a lease of a mill site, who had established and operated a mill and cut and removed timber continuously for a number of years, etc., is in such possession of the timber as to remit complainant seeking injunction to her remedy at law by action of ejectment, there being a dispute as to title to the timber.—Irwin v. Shoemaker, 88 So. 129, 205 Ala. 13.

(2) But a bill to enjoin cutting of timber, not included in sale and for accounting, was held not subject to objection that proper remedy was in ejectment with injunctive relief, since the doctrine of Irwin v. Shoemaker, supra (1), was inapplicable because no issue of title was presented and defendant rightfully in possession was abusing his privileges by wrongful cutting of timber, so that ejectment would not lie to oust him and plaintiff's only remedy was injunction to prevent the wrongful cutting of timber.—May v. Lowery, 107 So. 67, 214 Ala. 230.

Wild land
A landowner's lack of possession will not bar injunctive relief against timber cutting by one entering on unfenced, wild, and uncultivated land, under a timber deed executed by a former owner, but claiming no rights except that of entering to remove the timber.—Sikes v. Turner, 247 S.W. 803, 212 Mo.App. 419, transferred, see, Sup., 242 S.W. 940.

In Florida
(1) Actual possession, or pedis possessio, of the land is not essential to maintain the equitable jurisdiction given by the act of June 4, 1889, Rev.St. § 1469, to persons claiming to own timbered lands, to enjoin trespasses by cutting trees thereon, or removing logs therefrom, or other stated trespasses.—Reddick v. b. Rights of Purchaser of Standing Timber

The purchaser of standing timber may not be enjoined from cutting and removal thereof in compliance with his rights, and may himself enjoin the owner or others from interference with his right to cut and remove.

Where it appears that one cutting and removing timber is a bona fide purchaser of the standing timber, the court should refuse to enjoin him from such activities.[13] Further, one purchasing standing timber may seek the aid of equity to restrain others from interfering with his cutting and removal thereof,[14] his rights in this respect being limited to such timber as may have been covered by the terms of the grant.[15] One who has purchased standing timber with the license to cut and remove it within a designated time is entitled to an injunction against continuous interference of the owner of the land whereby removal within the time limited might be prevented,[16] but loses his right to injunctive relief on expiration of the time limited.[17] Where one purchases standing timber, with unlimited time for removal, thereby acquiring an estate in fee in timber, he may enjoin the owner of the fee in the land from cutting and appropriating timber when necessary to preserve his property.[18] It has been held that the grantee of a prior grantee of standing timber is entitled to maintain a suit in equity to enjoin the cutting of the timber by another.[19] It has also been held that where a grant conveyed, for a designated period, all the pine, cypress, and other timber whatsoever on the land for all uses and purposes, to be removed and taken off within the time stated, excepting the right of the second party to cut or box living pine trees for turpentine purposes, the grantees had such an interest in the trees as would support an action to enjoin an insolvent trespasser from cutting and boxing the trees for turpentine purposes.[20]

§ 67. —— Encroachments by Buildings or Other Structures

a. In general
b. Mandatory injunctions

a. In General

Injunction may issue to restrain threatened encroachment on the complainant's realty by buildings or other structures, the right to injunctive relief being based on the permanent character of the injury and the inadequacy of the legal remedy. Where, however, it appears that no irreparable injury would be sustained and that legal remedies would suffice, the court may refuse an injunction.

Equity has jurisdiction by injunctive process to stay or prevent the erection of permanent buildings or structures on the land of another;[21] and this is especially true where the building cannot by any possibility be mutually beneficial to the parties.[22] The grounds commonly assigned for awarding an injunction in these circumstances are that the trespass complained of would amount to a destruction of the estate,[23] and that the resulting injury would be of a permanent[24] and continuous nature,[25] to recover for which would require a multiplicity of suits which would furnish no adequate remedy.[26] Nevertheless, it has been recognized that not all buildings or structures on the land of another are of such a nature as to require injunctive relief, and an injunction will be denied where the threatened injury is not irreparable and destructive of plaintiff's property but is or will be susceptible of pecuniary compensation and such that the party may obtain adequate satisfaction in the ordinary course of law,[27] and it has been held that in the absence of a showing of irreparable injury an injunction will not issue to restrain the construction of a ditch across barren and uncultivated land.[28] An injunction should not be granted where the person injured will obtain but small benefit and the injunction will operate oppressively and to the great annoyance and injury of the other party unless the wrong is warranted and unprovoked.[29]

The matter of injunctive relief against encroachments by party walls is considered in the C.J.S. title Party Walls § 23, also 47 C.J. p 1364 note 75–p 1365 note 85.

b. Mandatory Injunctions

The general rule permits a mandatory injunction to remove encroaching buildings or other structures in the absence of an estoppel against the complainant, but its issuance ordinarily is in the discretion of the court and may be denied where inequitable.

The rule permitting use of injunctive process to restrain a threatened encroachment, as discussed supra subdivision a of this section, has been extended in a great number of cases by a recognition of the power of courts of equity to issue mandatory injunctions compelling the removal of buildings or other structures wrongfully placed on the land of another,[30] on grounds, discussed generally supra subdivision a of this section, such as inadequacy of legal remedy.[31]

(1) Generally.—McNamamy v.

The power of the court to issue this class of injunctions ordinarily will be exercised where there is a plain and intentional violation of plaintiff's rights,[32] or an encroachment against the known opposition of plaintiff,[33] or where defendant proceeded with the construction of a building without exercising due care to ascertain the precise location of the boundary line.[34] In these circumstances the injunction should be granted irrespective of whether such relief will impose on defendant an expense disproportionate to the benefit of plaintiff.[35] Complainant is not compelled to part with his property at a valuation, even though it would be much cheaper for defendant to pay the damages in money than to restore the property.[36] Plaintiff cannot be required to part with his property against his will nor should defendant be enabled to acquire an estate which he was unable to buy.[37] Injunctive relief will not be denied because of mere inconvenience attendant to removal,[38] or because plaintiff declines to sell the strip of land on which the encroachment exists,[39] or because the encroachment was in existence when plaintiff acquired the land,[40] or because plaintiff could not make immediate use of the land even if the encroachment were removed,[41] or because the land encroached upon is of little value,[42] or because plaintiff was contributorily negligent in bringing about the encroachment, if the question of damages is waived.[43] Generally speaking, and in the absence of special equities favoring defendant, a mandatory injunction for the removal of encroaching structures may be granted despite the fact that the complainant suffers little or no actual damage from the trespass,[44] or that the encroachment was made merely to provoke legal proceedings to determine defendant's right to make such encroachment,[45] or that the wrongdoer acted in good faith[46] or would be caused great inconvenience or damage by compulsory removal of the offending structure,[47] or that neighborly conduct[48] or business judgment[49] would dictate acceptance of pecuniary compensation in place of injunctive relief, and an injunction ordinarily will be refused only when there is some estoppel or laches on the part of plaintiff.[50]

Acquiescence of a landowner in the building of an encroaching structure may preclude him from subsequently securing a mandatory injunction for its removal,[51] but his consent to the building of one encroaching structure will not operate to bar future injunctive relief against other and distinct trespasses arising from construction of other structures on his land.[52] Where the landowner is aware of, or consents to, an encroachment at a time when it can be removed at small cost, he will not be allowed a mandatory injunction decreeing removal at a later time when the cost of removal would be comparatively great,[53] as where plaintiff stands by and makes no objection until the greater part of the work has been completed, and is endeavoring only to secure the amount of damage occasioned to his property before the work was completed, and disclaims any intention of perpetually enjoining the construction of the work,[54] and mandatory injunction may be denied where the owner or one who afterward becomes the owner is actively responsible for the encroachment.[55] In accordance with principles considered supra § 23, the injury suffered by plaintiff must be irreparable,[56] that is to say, of such a nature that it cannot be repaired, restored, or adequately compensated in money or that the compensation cannot be safely measured.[57] The granting of a mandatory injunction is largely a matter of discretion with the court,[58] and depends on a consideration of all the equities between the parties.[59] An injunction will not be granted when it will operate inequitably or oppressively;[60] or where the encroachment is trifling and the result of an innocent mistake and the damage caused to defendant by removal would be greatly disproportionate to the interest which plaintiff claims;[61]

Future nuisance

The fact that trifling encroachments which do not constitute a nuisance may become a nuisance or ripen into an easement if plaintiff desires to construct a building higher than its existing building will not alter the text rule.—Mary Jane Stevens Co. v. First Nat. Bldg. Co., supra.

Grant of injunction despite disproportionate expense see supra note 35.

or where the encroachment is so small that by statute an action for recovery of the land will not lie;[62] or where the encroachment involves the public interest and there is no doubt of defendant's ability to respond in damages;[63] or where some other incident is present that would render inequitable the issuance of a mandatory injunction.[64]

Encroachment under license. Where plaintiff is willing to give a revocable license, the decree should permit the encroachment to remain until the license is revoked;[65] and on termination of a license mandatory injunction may lie to compel removal of an encroachment wrongfully retained on the land.[66]

§ 68. —— Removal or Destruction of Buildings or Other Structures

a. In general
b. Fences and hedges

a. In General

Injunction lies to restrain the wrongful removal or destruction of buildings or other structures unless there is an adequate legal remedy; but the complainant may not enjoin removal of a structure improperly on another's land. Where the complainant desires himself to effect the removal of an encroaching structure he may enjoin the defendant from interfering with his efforts in this respect.

An injunction may issue to restrain removal or destruction of buildings or other structures which have become in legal contemplation a part of complainant's realty,[67] as in the case of fixtures under principles discussed in Fixtures § 60, and equity will restrain a removal constituting a trespass which goes to the destruction of the property in the character in which it is used.[68] It is not necessary to show the insolvency of defendant as a basis for injunctions of this nature.[69]

On the other hand, an injunction restraining removal or destruction of structures may be denied where the legal remedy is adequate,[70] and it has been held that a mere trespass, such as the removal of a church building from one point on land to another, cannot be made the basis for relief by injunction.[71]

A complainant whose structure wrongfully rests on the land of another may not enjoin such other from its removal or destruction.[72]

Enjoining interference with removal. Where complainant is entitled to the removal of structures as encroachments he may, in a proper case, secure an injunction to prevent defendant from interfering with their removal by the complainant, even though the circumstances are such as to preclude issuance of a mandatory injunction to compel defendant himself to effect the removal,[73] or

Dams

An injunction will not lie to restrain entry upon plaintiff's land and tearing down his dams built for protection of plaintiff's land, since there is an adequate remedy at law.—Edason v. Denison, 194 So. 342, 142 Fla. 101.

b. Fences and Hedges

An injunction to prevent the removal or destruction of a fence or hedge will be granted or refused under principles applicable in other cases of trespass or injury to realty, except as controlled by statute.

An injunction may lie to prevent the removal or destruction of a fence by a trespasser threatening continuous injury in such respect,[76] as in the case of repeated destruction,[77] and in such cases it is immaterial that defendant is solvent,[78] or that the boundary along which the fence is built is in dispute.[79] Also the removal of a fence may be enjoined where there are other acts of trespass which all taken together amount to a destruction of the property and the character in which it is enjoyed.[80]

Injunctive relief will be denied where the removal or destruction of a fence is a mere trespass remediable at law by an action for damages,[81] unless the objection of an adequate remedy at law has been waived so as to warrant the granting of an injunction.[82] An injunction to restrain removal of a fence will be denied where the fence is wrongfully placed,[83] and where one enters on land in the peaceable possession of another and constructs a fence on a disputed division line he becomes a trespasser and is not entitled to an injunction restraining the other from removing the fence.[84]

Hedges. In Nebraska it has been held that, although a hedge fence forming a boundary line which has been divided may have grown so as to interfere with the use of the adjoining land, the owner thereof will be enjoined from destroying it where it does not appear that he has observed the fence law by obtaining an order from the fence viewers requiring the hedge to be trimmed and maintained within proper dimensions, and where it does not appear that he did not intend immediately to construct a legal fence in place of the hedge as provided by the fence law, although the hedge may have grown so as to interfere with the use of his adjoining land.[85]

In Texas it has been held that a "hedge" is not a "fence" within a statute providing that any person who is owner or part owner of any fence connected with or adjoining any fences owned in part or in whole by any other person shall have the right to withdraw or separate his fence or part of fence after having given sufficient notice to the other party, and where a hedge constitutes the boundary line between two tracts an injunction will lie to prevent either from destroying the hedge.[86]

§ 69. —— Trespass by Animals

Where the owner of animals is under a legal duty to prevent their running at large, a landowner on whose property such animals trespass continuously or repeatedly may secure injunctive relief; but where no such duty rests on the animal owner injunctive relief will be denied in the absence of willful trespass.

Where the common-law rule, discussed in Animals § 185, requiring the owner of animals to confine them and, in default thereof, to answer for any damages occasioned by their trespass upon the land of another, prevails, it has been held that one may be restrained from permitting his animals to enter upon the unfenced lands of another where the repeated trespasses of the animals, if permitted to ing upon complainants' land and has not injured complainants, cannot be compelled to undergo expense of removing encroachment, but complainant may have an injunction to prevent interference with his own removal of the building.—Cutrona v. Columbus Theater, 151 A. 467, 107 N.J.Eq. 281.

continue, would require the bringing of numerous suits;[87] and a fortiori is this so where the trespassing animals repeatedly break into inclosed lands,[88] or where defendant threatens to continue to permit his cattle to go on complainant's premises and destroy his crops.[89] Under stock laws prohibiting the running at large of animals, as discussed in Animals § 185 b (2) (d), a landowner may secure injunctive relief against the trespassing of cattle where it is continuous or repeated in character and the statutory remedy afforded by the stock laws is inadequate.[90] On the other hand, where the common-law rule has been abrogated by statute and one is not liable in damages for permitting his animals to go and graze on the uninclosed lands of another, as considered in Animals § 185 b, the latter is not entitled to an injunction because of repeated or continuous trespasses of these animals.[91] Nevertheless, even where the common-law rule has been abrogated, in proper cases where the other necessary elements of equity jurisdiction are present, injunction will lie to restrain a live stock owner from willfully and knowingly driving or turning his stock upon the uninclosed premises of a private owner,[92] and the other necessary elements of equity jurisdiction are present when these trespasses are continuous or threatened to be repeated,[93] in which instance the impossibility of accurately estimating the damages in money and the prevention of a multiplicity of suits justify the enjoining of trespasses.[94] Where the trespass is willful, injunctive relief is not dependent on existence of a statutory fence,[95] and the fact that complainant unlawfully inclosed government lands within his fence will not, where the record fails to show resultant damage to defendants, operate to preclude complainant from securing injunctive relief against a defendant willfully driving his cattle within such inclosure, where they trespass on both the government and other lands claimed by complainant.[96] An injunction should be granted where defendant repeatedly drives his cattle on plaintiff's premises by opening his gates,[97] or tearing down his fences,[98] although there is authority to the effect that the injury is susceptible of perfect pecuniary compensation.[99] The driving of cattle across complainant's premises may be enjoined where any legal remedy that might be had against defendant would not be equal to the cost of procuring it.[1] Where there is nothing to show that the trespassing of defendant's animals will become continuous, and the only injury complained of is an act or acts already committed, for which plaintiff has adequate legal remedy, the court will refuse to issue an injunction.[2]

Dogs. Despite the common-law rule that an owner is not responsible for the trespasses of his dog made of its own volition, as set forth in Animals § 211, where the owner knowingly encourages or participates in a continuous or repeated trespass by his dogs he may be enjoined, there being no adequate remedy at law,[3] and the fact that the complaining owner shot some of the trespassing dogs in defense of his property does not preclude equitable relief on the theory that he did not come into court with clean hands.[4]

(35) Trespass on a private road.—

On the other hand, where a trespass or other injury alleged to complainant's realty is not within the principles heretofore discussed supra §§ 57–65, injunctive relief has been denied.[7]

Revocation or interference with license. Under proper circumstances a mandatory injunction may issue to protect a license over the land of another.[8] So where, under the views considered in the C.J.S. title Licenses §§ 88–92, also 37 C.J. p 290 note 36–p 296 note 2, it is not subject to termination at will of the licensor an injunction may be granted to prevent its revocation,[9] and, in a jurisdiction in which the legal right to revoke a parol license is as a rule recognized, the exercise of such right may be restrained where the licensor's conduct has been such that to permit a revocation would operate as a fraud on the licensee[10] or where the entry has been made under an agreement for a conveyance,[11] or the license is subsidiary to a valid grant.[12] Likewise, where a parol license has been granted to use land in a certain way, and improvements have been made on the faith of it, the licensor may be restrained by injunction from revoking the license to the irreparable injury of the licensee,[13] but where the license is revocable at the pleasure of the licensor the licensee cannot maintain a bill to enjoin its revocation or obstruction.[14] Where the right to the license has been lost by the licensee an injunction will no longer issue in his behalf to protect it.[15]

Obstruction of light, air, and view. In the absense of a covenant or statute to the contrary, an injunction will not lie to restrain the erection or maintenance of a structure by a landowner on his own land near the land of the adjoining owner although the structure has resulted or will result in cutting off light and air coming laterally from land on which the structure is erected.[16] However, where a property owner's business is damaged through the erection of a wall for advertising purposes on adjoining property which interfered with the view of his garage and filling station and which in no physical way benefited the filling station business of the adjoining owner, he may be entitled to an injunction requiring its removal where the wall was more valuable for advertising purposes after removal and relocation at the rear of the adjoining owner's property.[17]

§ 71. Injury to Personal Property

Generally equity will not issue an injunction to prevent an injury to, or an interference with, personal property unless there is no adequate remedy at law.

In the absence of special circumstances,[20] injunction will not be granted to protect personal property[21] or to prevent a trespass with reference thereto[22] or a wrongful conversion thereof,[23] since the remedy at law is as a rule adequate.[24] Hence an action ordinarily will not lie to prevent the removal[25] or conversion[26] of personal property where the injury may be fully redressed by an action at law for damages, and, more particularly, where the taking may also be punished as a crime.[27] However, even where there is an existing legal remedy, where such remedy is not plain, complete, or adequate, equity may enjoin an injury to, or an interference with, personal property.[28] For the purpose of protecting specific chattels of such peculiar value that they cannot be the subject of adequate compensation by way of damages, injunctions may be granted;[29] and the question of the peculiar value of the personalty and the inadequacy of the legal remedy, as respects the right to an injunction, are to be determined by the chancellor.[30]

Removal of timber already cut. While there is some authority to the contrary,[31] it has very generally been held that the removal of timber already cut will not ordinarily be enjoined,[32] at least in the absence of an allegation of the insolvency of defendant.[33] If already severed, the timber is personal property,[34] and complainant has a plain and adequate relief by action at law.[35] It has been held, however, that, if the timber has been cut after issuance of a restraining order, but before service thereof, its removal will be enjoined.[36]

§ 72. Conveyance or Disposition of Property

In a proper case equity will enjoin a conveyance, transfer, removal, or other disposition of property where the remedy at law is inadequate; a claimant or creditor who has not reduced his claim to judgment and is without a lien, title, or interest in the property of his debtor is not entitled to such an injunction.

In the absence of an adequate remedy at law, equity may restrain the sale, conveyance, or other disposition of either real[37] or personal[38] property, as where it is necessary to prevent irreparable injury[39] and the threatened or contemplated transfer is in violation of complainant's rights.[40] Under these rules, among other instances, an injunction has been held properly granted to restrain a sale of pledged property,[41] to prevent a sale on execution by one claiming under an allegedly void transfer of the execution,[42] to restrain the disposal, or encumbering, of a judgment rendering an equitable set-off against it ineffective,[43] or to restrain a sale under a note and trust deed on the ground that the payee has been changed.[44] An injunction to compel the surrender of a bill of sale unlawfully pledged by the pledgor may be granted where the pledgor is insolvent;[45] in such case the remedy against the pledgee in replevin and for damages for withholding the bill of sale is not so clear as to require a dismissal of the bill for an injunction.[46] Creditors having a lien,[47] such as mortgages,[48] chattel mortgagees,[49] or mechanic's lienors,[50] are in general entitled to an injunction to restrain the removal, disposal, or destruction of the property subject to their encumbrances; but ordinarily the rule is otherwise in the case of a creditor who has no lien,[51] even though defendant was preparing to leave the state or to remove his property beyond its jurisdictional limits.[52] Where a creditor has a lien or title or interest attaching to the property of his debtor, he may invoke the equitable power of the court to prevent by injunction interference by another therewith in a case where the facts would render the grant of such relief appropriate.[53]

In the absence of a statute or rule of court[54] the commencement of an action at law does not of itself entitle plaintiff to an injunction restraining defendant from disposing of his property,[55] even though such disposition of the property might prevent the collection of a judgment in the event that plaintiff should recover one.[56]

Enjoining spouse's transfers. The law does not ordinarily restrict transfers of property by the husband during his lifetime.[57] Accordingly, a wife collecting alimony is not entitled to an injunction restraining her husband from transferring any part of his assets where she does not allege that her husband was in default in payment of alimony or that such transfers would make him insolvent;[58] nor may a spouse obtain an order restraining her husband from making gifts to others until it is shown that it is likely that the husband would make such gifts.[59]

§ 73. —— Transfer or Pledge of Corporate Stock

Equity will restrain or compel the sale or transfer of stock in a proper case where the remedy at law is inadequate at least until the rights of the parties may be adjudicated.

Although an injunction will not issue to restrain the sale or transfer of shares of stock under circumstances where complainant's right to an injunction does not appear,[60] in a proper case equity will restrain or compel the sale or transfer of stock where the remedy at law is inadequate,[61] at least until the rights of the parties may be adjudi-

Holder of purchase-money notes

Transferee of purchase-money notes secured by retention of legal title was held entitled to injunction and receivership, where building containing oil mill constituting chief value of the property had been destroyed by fire, and there was danger of loss or deterioration, and purchaser was insolvent and value of other property insufficient in connection with insurance money to pay the notes.—Carter v. Johnson, 119 S.E. 22, 156 Ga. 207.

Tender of payment as condition precedent

Where, at the time receiver was appointed for corporation, it was in default under contract for purchase of stock and sellers had forfeited contract and retaken stock from escrow holder, and there was no showing that they were insolvent or that damages would not be complete and adequate, receiver could not, without tender of overdue payments, have sellers enjoined from exercising their rights as owners until he could determine whether it would be profitable to perform the contract.—Chapman v. Issuance of new certificates

An owner of stock held by another as trustee may be entitled to restrain the corporation from issuing new certificates to the trustee personally, in lieu of the stock held in trust and in the possession of the trustee.—Martel v. Block, 98 So. 398, 154 La. 863.

cated.[62] The transfer of stock on the corporate books will be enjoined where it is claimed that there was a failure of consideration for the transfer or that the certificates of stock were delivered without authority[63] or that the person holding the stock sold it in violation of his duty.[64]

In accordance with the rule that equity will refuse an injunction which would be ineffectual or where the circumstances are such that the injunction cannot be enforced, as considered supra § 29, an injunction to restrain a transfer of stock which has already been completed will not be awarded since the granting thereof would be useless;[65] nor will an injunction issue to restrain a corporation from transferring on its books a shareholder's stock where the court had no jurisdiction over the shareholder and was without power to restrain him from selling and transferring his stock.[66] Under some circumstances, however, a nonresident shareholder of a domestic corporation, his pledgee, or the corporation itself may be enjoined from transferring such shareholder's certificate of stock.[67]

Where the transfer and assignment of stock in a corporation by way of a pledge as security for a debt pass title thereto to the pledgee, as discussed in Corporations § 426, the pledgee may compel the corporation to make the transfer of the shares of stock on its books and to recognize the pledgee as owner.[68]

§ 74. —— Transfer or Pledge of Instruments or Securities for Payment of Money

An injunction may issue to prevent the transfer of a negotiable instrument or security for the payment of money where it is necessary to avoid an injury for which there is no adequate remedy at law, as, for example, the rendering unavailing of a defense against the instrument in the hands of an innocent transferee, as in other cases an injunction will not as a rule issue where there is an adequate remedy at law.

In general a court of equity will, at the instance of the maker of a negotiable note having a defense against the payee, enjoin a transfer of the note which would result in destroying such defense,[69] or, as the rule is sometimes otherwise stated, equity will enjoin the transfer of a negotiable note or other negotiable instrument on grounds which, as between the maker and the payee, would prevent the payee from enforcing it,[70] and on a proper showing the court will order the instrument delivered up to the maker,[71] or canceled.[72] An injunction will be awarded in a proper case regardless of whether the court is able to enforce its order.[73] However, an injunction will not be allowed restraining the transfer of a promissory note on a mere claim of indebtedness.[74] It has also been held proper in cases where the remedy at law was inadequate to enjoin the transfer of other instruments for the payment of money, such as bonds,[75] chattel mortgages,[76] or vendor's lien note.[77]

An injunction will not issue to enjoin the transfer of a negotiable note or other negotiable instrument where there is an adequate and complete remedy at law.[78]

Fraud, duress, or undue influence. The negotiation or transfer of negotiable securities by a holder who has obtained them fraudulently[79] or by duress[80] or undue influence[81] will be enjoined.

Failure of consideration. Complete or partial failure of consideration or want of consideration constitutes ground for restraining the transfer of negotiable securities to prevent their falling into the hands of a bona fide purchaser.[82]

Defense available at law. Ordinarily if complainant's defense can be presented in a suit at law, an injunction against the negotiation of the securities will not be granted.[83] This rule applies inter alia to defenses on past-due notes,[84] to the defense that the note was altered,[85] or where the instrument is invalid on its face[86] or its invalidity will appear on the proofs of the party claiming under it.[87] However, in accordance with the general rule considered supra §25, it is essential that the remedy at law should be as practical and as efficient as the equitable remedy in rendering justice and as prompt in its administration.[88]

Indorsement and delivery of check. Where a check is made to an agent and delivered to him for indorsement and delivery to his principal, the agent may be compelled to perform his duty by injunction where the principal has no speedy and adequate remedy at law,[89] the remedies of garnishment and attachment being inadequate.[90]

The entry of credits on unmatured negotiable instruments may be enforced by injunction where the danger of their passing into the hands of bona fide purchasers before maturity is established.[91]

§ 75. Dealing in Tickets of Carriers

Where a carrier makes its tickets nontransferable, it may enjoin persons from buying and reselling such tickets.

Railroad companies which have issued, in consideration of a reduced rate, tickets which are nontransferable and subject to forfeiture if any person other than the original purchaser attempts to use them are entitled to an injunction against brokers who are engaged in the business of buying such tickets from the original purchasers and reselling to others to be used in violation of their terms,[92] and especially is this true where the party dealing in the tickets has expressly declared his intention to continue doing so.[93]

The right invaded, the right to contract concerning a legal subject, is property within the meaning of the law;[94] and it is elementary that an actionable wrong is committed by one who maliciously interferes in a contract between the parties and induces one of them to break it to the injury of another.[95] This principle applies with full force and effect to the carrying on of the business of purchasing and selling nontransferable reduced railroad tickets for profit to the injury of the railroad issuing them,[96] and the ingredients of actual malice in the sense of personal ill will are not necessary because the element of just cause or excuse for the commission of the act is wanting.[97] The specific injury inflicted consists in cheating the carrier out of the regular fare on every mile of its line on which travel is made under cover of one of these tickets in the hands of anyone other than the original purchaser.[98]

Complainant may maintain an action at law for damages, but such a remedy is inadequate,[99] as involving a multiplicity of suits,[1] and because of the difficulty of detecting each offense and ascertaining the pecuniary equivalents for the injury to complainant's business and the inconvenience and annoyances, extra expense, outlays, and risks involved in enforcing the forfeiture provision in the contract of carriage.[2] Some decisions hold that an injunction will be awarded to prevent dealing not only in tickets issued or about to be issued but also in tickets which the carrier may issue from time to time in the future according as the business or interests of the company may require;[3] but others hold that a railroad company is not entitled to an injunction against dealing in nontransferable railway tickets which may thereafter be issued as occasion may arise.[4]

a. In General

An injunction may issue to prevent the payment or collection of money where there is no other adequate remedy to prevent an injury therefrom; but ordinarily it will not lie in other cases.

An injunction ordinarily will not lie for the collection of a debt or to compel the payment of money[5] or to restrain the collection or payment of money[6] where there is an adequate and complete rem-

Blocked foreign funds
Equity will not intervene to restrain defendant bank from interfering with complainant's withdrawal of funds from its account where such funds have been "frozen" by executive orders of the president of edy at law. On the other hand, where the remedy at law is inadequate,[7] or when the party about to receive or collect the money is insolvent,[8] or would be unable fully to respond to an award of damages,[9] or in a case where the remedy is conferred by statute,[10] a prohibitory or mandatory injunction may be granted with reference to the collection or payment of money. An injunction will not issue where its allowance would result in serious injury to the rights of the public[11] or where it is unnecessary for the protection of some substantial equity of complainant[12] or merely because the proceeding is representative in form.[13] A statute forbidding an action to restrain the assessment or collection of taxes cannot be extended beyond its terms.[14]

For the purpose of preventing fraud[15] or breach of trust,[16] and as ancillary relief to suits in equity,[17] the collection or payment of money may be enjoined. A mandatory injunction to compel payment of money is a proper remedy where a fund has been collected for a specific purpose under a contract authorizing disbursement of money only in the manner and form therein directed.[18]

Interference with collection. A finance company which holds the legal title to notes and purchase contracts in which dealers have a beneficial interest may restrain the dealers from interfering with the collection of such notes and contracts.[19]

b. Bills and Notes

The collection or payment of a bill or note may be enjoined in the absence of an adequate remedy at law where necessary for the prevention of fraud or where other circumstances render the collection or payment improper.

Where the remedy at law is inadequate, the collection or payment of bills, notes, or other negotiable instruments may be restrained.[20] In the exercise of its jurisdiction to prevent the consummation of fraud, equity will enjoin the holder or indorsee from collecting notes or other negotiable securities which he has obtained or holds fraudulently,[21] and this principle has been extended to notes given in renewal of notes obtained by fraud or undue influence.[22] In the absence of special circumstances authorizing the intervention of equity, however, the lawful holder of a note cannot be restrained from collecting it.[23] Where, under the terms of a will, notes given by testator's children are to be deducted from their shares of the estate, the executor may properly be enjoined from collecting such a note against the spouse of a child, although such spouse is a joint maker.[24]

C. CONTRACTS

§ 77. In General

An injunction will not be granted to restrain persons sui juris from making valid contracts.

An injunction will not be granted to restrain persons sui juris from making valid contracts;[25] and injunctive relief against the making of an agreement will be denied where there is an adequate remedy at law or before an administrative agency.[26]

Injunctive relief will not be granted plaintiff when the effect of such grant would be to assist plaintiff to accomplish what he has agreed not to do,[27] or where it would result in effectuating a breach of a valid contract.[28]

§ 78. Negative or Restrictive Covenants or Stipulations in General

The enforcement of negative or restrictive covenants or stipulations by injunction is discussed infra § 79 et seq.

§ 79. —— Specific Performance Compared

An injunction to restrain the breach of a negative contract is in effect specific performance and the principles on which the two remedies are granted are generally the same.

Classifying contracts as either affirmative, where one agrees that something has been or will be done, or negative, where one agrees that something has not been or will not be done, the equitable remedy for breach of the first is a decree for specific performance and for breach of the second is an injunction.[29] Although it has been said that an injunction against the breach of a negative contract is not strictly specific performance,[30] it is, in effect, enforcing specific performance;[31] it is an indirect and negative mode of compelling specific performance.[32] The jurisdiction exercised is in substance the same,[33] as are the general principles on which the two remedies are granted,[34] and where a contract is one of a class that will be specifically enforced, equity may enjoin a breach.[35] Unless otherwise expressly provided by statute,[36] the power and duty of a court of equity to grant an injunction against the breach of a contract are even greater than its power and duty to grant decrees of specific performance;[37] the remedy by injunction, in some circumstances, may be available, even though a decree for specific performance is not to be had,[38] although it has been stated that equity will not enforce a negative covenant, express or implied, in a contract which it cannot specifically enforce, unless a breach of the negative covenant will cause loss to the promisee distinct from that resulting from the mere failure of the promisor to carry out his affirmative promise.[39]

Where the contract contains both affirmative and negative terms, breach of the latter may be enjoined, even though the former cannot be specifically enforced by decree,[40] where the negative and affirmative provisions are entirely separate and distinct,[41] although, as shown infra § 82 b (1) (4), according to some early decisions, relating to contracts for personal services, which decisions for the most part have been overruled, if the contract contained both affirmative and negative covenants and the affirmative covenants were of such a nature that they could not be specifically enforced, a court of equity was equally without power to enforce by injunction the negative covenants. The difficulties inherent in enforcing an affirmative contract, such as to perform personal services or to carry on an extensive business, are not met with in preventing the breach of a contract not to do something; but a court will not attempt to overcome such difficulties and enforce such an affirmative contract specifically by issuing an injunction mandatory in its nature.[42] Nevertheless injunctive relief against the breach of the negative covenant will not be ordered where the statute provides that an injunction cannot be granted to prevent the breach of a contract the performance of which would not be specifically enforced.[43]

§ 80. Relief against Breach of Contract in General

a. In general
b. Express or implied negative covenants
c. General principles applicable to issuance of injunction

a. In General

In a proper case a breach of a contract may be enjoined.

Except to the extent that injunctive relief may be forbidden by statute,[44] where the breach of a contract consists in the doing of acts that a court of equity can prevent by injunction, and when it further appears that damages at law are not an adequate remedy, because the damage cannot be computed or is otherwise irreparable, such acts may, sometimes as a result of express statutory provision, be enjoined.[45] Especially is this so where the act constituting the breach would leave defendant insolvent and incapable of responding in damages.[46] Whether or not the damage actually is irreparable is a matter to be determined by the circumstances of each particular case, and the mere difficulty of computing damages is not alone a ground for the interference of equity.[47]

The injury is considered irreparable in many cases where the parties have entered into contracts for the assignment or use of patented articles or patent rights,[48] or for the use or construction of a railroad or its right of way,[49] or, as considered infra § 83, for the sale of chattels not to be obtained elsewhere. On the other hand, no injunction should be granted where its effect would be to deprive defendant of his liberty.[50]

b. Express or Implied Negative Covenants

An injunction ordinarily is the appropriate remedy to restrain the breach of an express negative covenant and in some instances a negative covenant may be implied and its breach enjoined.

Where the contract is negative in form, requiring a party to refrain from doing certain things, injunction ordinarily is the appropriate equitable remedy.[51] However, the breach of a contract will not be enjoined merely because it is negative in form in case it is affirmative in substance.[52]

Implied negative covenants. A contract affirmative in form often involves a negative in substance, and in such case the court may import the negative quality and enjoin acts in breach of the contract, in cases where an injunction is otherwise proper; the test is not in the form of the language used, but in the quality of the acts required.[53] Where one has agreed to do a thing in a certain manner, the negative may be imported that he will not do it otherwise,[54] as, for example, in the case of a contract to construct a building according to

Sale of radio station

Where contract for sale of radio station owned by chamber of commerce was not invalid as in excess of power of board of governors of chamber, chamber would be restrained from doing any affirmative act, or exerting any influence to hinder or prevent performance of contract, which was unique in that it contemplated sale of station as an organized business, and sale of station's good will.—Chamber of Commerce of Hot Springs v. c. General Principles Applicable to Issuance of Injunction

(1) In general
(2) Existence and nature of right
(3) Adequate remedy at law
(4) Conduct of complainant as affecting right
(5) Mutuality growing out of contract
(6) Provision for penalty or damages
(7) Other considerations in granting or refusing injunction

(1) In General

The granting of an injunction to restrain a breach of contract ordinarily rests in the sound discretion of the court.

In accordance with the general rule discussed supra § 14, the granting of an injunction to restrain a breach of contract rests largely in the sound discretion of the court.[57] This discretion, however, is a legal and not an arbitrary one;[58] and where the rights of the parties are based on a complete and fair contract the field of judicial discretion is much narrower than where the rights of the parties are based on the general law.[59] Relief by injunction will be granted or withheld according to the real equity of the case in view of all the facts and circumstances.[60]

(2) Existence and Nature of Right

(b) Doubtful and disputed rights

(a) In General

The breach of a contract which is unenforceable will not be enjoined.

An injunction will not issue to prevent the breach of a contract which is for any reason unenforceable,[61] as where the contract is against public policy,[62] or where it is unenforceable by reason of the infancy of defendant[63] or by reason of the fact that it is oral and is not to be performed within one year from the making thereof.[64] The contract, the violation of which is to be restrained, must be so far equal and just in its terms and circumstances as to be enforceable in equity and good conscience;[65] and it must not operate harshly or be inequitable.[66]

(b) Doubtful and Disputed Rights

An injunction to restrain the breach of a contract will be refused where the existence of the contract is in doubt, or its existence is not established with that degree of certainty which is required, or its terms are vague, ambiguous, indefinite, or uncertain.

Where the existence of a contract is in doubt,[67] or its existence is not proved with that degree of certainty which the law requires,[68] or where its terms are vague, ambiguous, indefinite, or uncertain[69] an injunction against a breach thereof will be refused, the relief being improper where it is not clear what acts are to be performed.[70] To authorize the issuance of an injunction the terms of the agreement must be so precise that neither party could misunderstand them.[71] Where there is no immediately impending injury irreparable in nature, complainant will be left to establish his right at law.[72]

Breach doubtful. It is not necessary that a breach of contract should have already occurred in order to obtain an injunction, since threatened breaches may be enjoined if there is good ground for fearing their commission by defendant;[73] but if the threatened breach is not clearly impending, or if there is grave doubt as to whether the acts of defendant actually constitute a breach, an injunction will not issue.[74]

(3) Adequate Remedy at Law

An injunction to restrain the breach of a contract ordinarily will not issue where there is an adequate and complete remedy at law.

Although it has been held or said in some cases that, where the contract contains a direct negative stipulation, the breach thereof will be enjoined, even though no special damage can be proved, and even though damages at law would be an adequate remedy,[75] yet, subject to some well-defined exceptions, considered infra §§ 84, 87, the general rule, stated supra § 25, that an injunction will not issue where there is an adequate and complete remedy at law applies with full force and effect to the issuance of injunctions to prevent breaches of contract.[76] Where the remedy at law is adequate and complete the complaining party will be remitted to it.[77] It is not enough that defendant is insolvent so that a judgment for damages against him could not be collected;[78] complainant must make an affirmative showing that the remedy at law is not adequate, except in cases where the very nature of the subject matter has led courts to presume that damages would not compensate, as in the case of contracts affecting the use and enjoyment of real property and contracts not to open up a competing business.[79]

(4) Conduct of Complainant as Affecting Right

An injunction to restrain the breach of a contract may be denied where the complainant is in default or where he has acquiesced in the breach or has been guilty of inequitable conduct.

A party is not entitled to enjoin the breach of a contract by another, unless he himself has performed what the contract required of him so far as possible; if he himself is in default or has given cause for nonperformance by defendant he has no standing in equity.[80] Small and insignificant

Term "adequate remedy at law" means that the legal remedy must be as efficient as the indicated equitable relief would be, that such legal remedy must be presently available in a single action, and that such remedy must be certain and complete, taking into consideration the specific advantages to which the party to whom performance is due is entitled by the terms of the contract. —Fuchs v. Adequate remedy at law

(1) As respects whether holders of corporate debentures had right to enjoin consummation of corporate loans allegedly in violation of covenants so as to entitle debenture holders to recover stock pledged by corporation as security for loans, that debenture holders would have to wait sixty days before bringing action at law for face amount of debt would not of itself have made legal remedy inadequate, unless at least some likelihood of insolvency occurring within sixty-day period were shown.—Kelly v. breaches by complainant will not, however, bar his right to an injunction.[81]

Where the covenants are independently or only collaterally connected, although contained in the same instrument, a breach thereof by one party will not necessarily deprive him of the right to enjoin a violation of the contract by the other party; and where the breach is of such a nature that it may be fully repaired an injunction may be granted on condition that such reparation be made.[82]

Coming into court with clean hands. Equity will not grant injunctive relief against the breach of a contract unless complainant comes into court with clean hands,[83] although where the interests of the public are involved the court may restrain the breach notwithstanding plaintiff and defendant are in pari delicto.[84]

Acquiescence or laches. A party may lose his right to an injunction through his own acquiescence in the breach by the other party.[85] This acquiescence may be indicated in various ways, as by delay in making any objection and in seeking the injunction,[86] or by consenting to the breach in question, whether the consent is express or is implied from acts inconsistent with an intention to enforce the terms of the contract.[87] Complainant's own acts inconsistent with the contract may amount to an acquiescence in similar acts by others.[88] Acquiescence may be shown also by allowing third persons under the same contract relations with the complainant as is defendant to break their contracts without objection from him.[89] However, acquiescence in a mere trifling breach does not bar the right to enjoin some subsequent substantial breach.[90]

(5) Mutuality Growing Out of Contract

(a) Mutuality of remedy and obligation

(b) Mutuality of benefit; consideration

(a) Mutuality of Remedy and Obligation

A breach of contract usually will not be restrained unless there is mutuality of remedy and obligation.

In analogy to the remedy by specific performance the general rule is that a court of equity will not enjoin a breach of contract which is executory on both sides where the remedy is not mutual.[91] If the contract cannot be enforced by both parties, a court of equity will aid neither of them,[92] but will leave them to their remedy at law.[93] Nevertheless some decisions hold that, where there is mutuality of obligation under a contract, injunction for enforcement of the negative agreement there-decreed.—Westchester Laboratories Sales Corporation v. Westchester Laboratories, 3 N.Y.S.2d 224, 167 Misc. 376.

Extent of mutuality

The mutuality required to render a contract enforceable in equity does not require that each party thereto have precisely the same remedy: it is sufficient that the contract be fair and reasonable, and that each party have the means of compelling performance of the promises mutually agreed on.

in contained will not be denied because the affirmative obligation of the contract could not be enforced by the same remedy;[94] and in some jurisdictions the doctrine of mutuality of remedy no longer prevails.[95] Where there has been part performance of the contract by complainant and a failure on the part of defendant to carry it out would operate as a fraud on his rights, the fact that the contract is lacking in mutuality will not prevent the allowance of an injunction against its breach by defendant.[96]

Contract terminable at option of one party only. According to some decisions the fact that a contract is terminable at the option of one only of the parties does not of itself render the contract objectionable for lack of mutuality of remedy, or prevent the party in whose favor the option exists from enjoining a breach of the contract where a proper case is otherwise made out for equitable relief by injunction;[97] injunction will be awarded notwithstanding the option, unless the contract is of such a nature that the reservation of the option makes the whole contract inequitable.[98] Other decisions have held that there is no mutuality of remedy in a contract terminable at the option of only one of the parties and that a breach of the covenant will not be enjoined at the suit of the party in whose favor the option is given.[99]

Mutuality of obligation. While there is authority to the contrary,[1] it is very generally held that the breach of a negative covenant in a contract will not be enjoined where there is a want of mutuality in its obligation,[2] and this is so, although the contract is such that the difficulties of enforcing it against one of the parties might not be encountered in enforcing it against the other.[3]

(b) Mutuality of Benefit; Consideration

An injunction will not issue to restrain the breach of a contract which is palpably unfair, inequitable, and one-sided, although mere inadequacy of consideration is not ground for refusing relief.

Where a contract is palpably unfair, inequitable, and one-sided, and complainant is attempting to enforce an unconscionable bargain, he is not entitled to the equitable remedy of injunction,[4] but the court will relegate plaintiff to his cause of action at law, especially where it is not alleged that defendant is financially irresponsible or unable to respond in damages.[5] In considering the propriety of relief by injunction against the breach of a contract, a court of equity will not undertake to determine, whether complainant gave an adequate consideration for the right he claims; its adequacy is for the parties to determine, and an injunction issues without investigating whether defendant used

Reason for this view
The legal principle that contracts must be mutual does not mean that in every case each party must have the same remedy for a breach as the other. Mere difference in the right stipulated for does not destroy mutuality of remedy as the contract covers a wide range of obligation and duty as between the parties, and it may not be impaired so long as the bounds of reasonableness and fairness are not transgressed.—Thompson v. poor judgment.[6] However, the consideration must be valuable; otherwise there is no contract either in equity or at law,[7] and, if the inadequacy is evident and so great as to shock the chancellor's conscience and lead to a conclusion of fraud or mistake, an injunction may be refused.[8] An injunction should not be granted where there is no consideration at all, where irreparable injury will occur.[9]

(6) Provision for Penalty or Damages

An injunction to restrain the breach of a contract will not be denied because the contract specifies that a penalty shall be paid on its breach, nor does a provision for liquidated damages necessarily preclude the granting of injunctive relief.

The fact that a sum of money is named in a contract as payable on its breach as a penalty and not as liquidated damages does not prevent equity from granting an injunction.[10] The penalty is intended as an additional security for the performance of the covenant and not as a substitute for performance.[11]

Liquidated damages. Where liquidated damages are provided for in case of a breach, and it appears that the intention was to give the party the alternative to perform or pay,[12] or that the liquidated damages should be an exclusive remedy,[13] the breach will not be enjoined; and it has been held that this is so, although defendant is insolvent.[14]

Nevertheless, the equitable jurisdiction of the court to enforce a negative covenant is not excluded merely by reason of the fact that in addition to the covenant the contract contains a stipulation for liquidated damages.[15] It is a question of intent to be deduced from the whole instrument and the surrounding circumstances whether the provision for liquidated damages was intended to be an exclusive remedy.[16] If the contract appears to be such in its character and purpose that its performance was contemplated by the parties and not merely that an award of damages should be made for the breach, equitable relief by injunction will be granted notwithstanding the contract provides for liquidated damages for the breach.[17] A fortiori an injunction will not be denied because the contract provides for damages in case of breach where there is nothing to show that the sum named was intended as liquidated damages.[18]

(7) Other Considerations in Granting or Refusing Injunction

Various other matters may be considered in granting or refusing injunctive relief against the breach of a contract, such as the necessity for continuous supervision by the court, injury resulting to the public, etc.

In addition to the matters considered supra this section, various other matters may be of importance or decisive in determining whether an injunction to restrain the breach of a contract shall issue.[19] The mere fact that an injunction, if granted, will not in and of itself grant full and complete relief is not of itself sufficient ground for denying the writ where the party is otherwise entitled to it.[20]

Injury to third persons
Defendant will not be restrained by injunction from breaking his contract with complainant, when such action would necessarily compel him to break a contract with an innocent third person to the injury of such third person.—Edmundson-Randle Drug Co. v. Partin Mfg. Co., 75 So. 966, 200 Ala. 208—32 C.J. p 194 note 27.

20. Ind.—Cincinnati, B. & C. R. Co.

An injunction should not be granted, it has been held, where, because of then existing facts, defendant would be unable to perform the acts commanded by the injunction;[21] where it has become impossible to perform the contract;[22] where the court is without adequate power to compel performance of the contract;[23] where the allowance of an injunction would indirectly or negatively compel the performance of duties, the specific performance of which would not be decreed if the action was brought in that form;[24] or where the breaches are merely technical and defendant is endeavoring in good faith to observe the contract;[25] but a breach of the spirit and intent of a contract will be enjoined, even though not a breach of its express terms.[26] An injunction will not be granted where it would be subversive of justice between the parties[27] or where it would serve no useful purpose.[28]

Balance of convenience and injury to public. Except, as considered infra § 87, in the case of contracts containing covenants restricting the use of land which for reasons peculiar to this class of contracts stands on a footing by itself, in accordance with the general rule stated supra § 31 that the court will take into consideration the relative inconvenience or injury which the parties will sustain by the granting or refusal of the application for injunction, where no substantial harm would be done to complainant by a breach of the contract and where very great damage would result to defendant if the relief asked for was granted, the injunction should be denied.[29] In addition, equity may decline to enjoin the breach of a contract where to do so would injuriously affect performance by defendant of duties which it owes to the public,[30] or deprive the public of the benefit of defendant's entering into an enterprise.[31]

Continuous supervision by court necessary to enforcement. Except in cases in which the public has an interest,[32] a court ordinarily will not enjoin a breach of contract where to render the injunction effective would require the continuous supervision and direction of the court for an indefinite period of time,[33] as such a duty is inappropriate to the functions of the court;[34] and especially is this so where the performance of such duty by the court would be practically impossible.[35]

Agreement for arbitration. It has been held that a provision in a contract that any differences arising thereunder shall be settled by arbitrators does not estop a party thereto from seeking an injunction to restrain a violation thereof.[36]

Agreement for termination. An injunction will not be granted to restrain defendant's alleged vio-

(2) Injunction against distributor contracting to buy entire requirements for trade.—Dairy Co-op. Ass'n v. Brandes Creamery, 30 P.2d 338, 147 Or. 488, followed in 30 P.2d 344, 147 Or. 503.

(3) Truckmen who transported milk from Connecticut producers, who were members of dairymen's co-operative association, to Rhode Island dealers designated by association, would be enjoined from delivering milk of association members to dealers not designated by association in violation of members' agreements with association, although truckmen had not induced breach of agreements, where enforcement of individual agreements would create multiplicity of suits, the remedy by damages would be inadequate, the association would sustain irreparable injury, and injunction would be effective to prevent breach of agreements.—Local Dairymen's Co-op. Ass'n v. Potvin, 173 A. 535, 54 R.I. 436.

An injunction will not be granted where the contract does not plainly confer the right to be protected[41] or where it is vague and indefinite,[42] where there is a want of mutuality of remedy,[43] where plaintiff has been guilty of laches,[44] where injunctive relief would be unjust and inequitable,[45] or where an injunction would require continuous or repeated supervision by the court.[46]

In some instances the court, where the legal remedy has been deemed adequate, has refused an injunction,[47] and a familiar application of this principle is that the remedy at law is adequate in the case of contracts to sell chattel articles exclusively to complainant, where such articles may be obtained in the market;[48] but the rule is otherwise where the remedy at law is not adequate because of the limited nature and uncertainty of the market, the necessity for going into other markets where competition is keen for a supply, the inconvenience and labor of finding a supply, the disarrangement of plaintiff's business and calculations for the future, the impossibility of determining the damages equitably, and the multiplicity of suits necessary to obtain recompense.[49]

Liquidated damages. A provision in the contract for liquidated damages does not necessarily preclude injunctive relief against its breach.[50]

However, in some jurisdictions the doctrine of mutuality of remedy no longer prevails.—Sharpless-Hendler Ice Cream Co. v. Davis, 147 A. 305, 16 Del.Ch. 315.

Remedy held mutual

(1) While a cotton grower might sue for damages for a co-operative marketing association's breach of its contract to market his cotton, such action would ordinarily be ineffective or inadequate, in view of the fact that the association has no capital stock, so that the contract is not unenforceable in equity at the association's suit because of lack of mutuality of remedies, the grower being entitled to equitable relief in the event of a breach by the association.—Texas Farm Bureau Cotton Ass'n v. Stovall, 253 S.W. 1101, 113 Tex. 273, reversing, Civ.App., 248 S.W. 1109.

(2) A co-operative marketing association, organized under Vernon Civ. St.Annot.Suppl. 1922 arts 14½k–14½yy, being an association, ordinarily unincorporated, without capital stock, having members instead of stockholders, and operated for some mutually beneficial purpose, as shown by arts 14½pp–14½qq, a grower's contract, as part of his membership application, to sell his cotton to it exclusively, is not unenforceable in equity for lack of mutuality of remedies, he being entitled to have it performed by the association, whose refusal would be tantamount to suspending or expelling him.—Texas Farm Bureau Cotton Ass'n v. Stovall, supra.

Effect of statute authorizing injunction

A co-operative marketing association, organized under Co-operative Marketing Act, Vernon Civ.St.Annot. Suppl. 1922 arts 14½k–14½yy, may enforce performance of a grower's contract to sell his cotton to it exclusively, in a suit for specific performance or for an injunction against a breach, as authorized by the statute, even if otherwise unenforceable in equity for lack of mutuality of remedies.—Texas Farm Bureau Cotton Ass'n v. Stovall, supra.

Determination of adequacy of legal remedy

Whether complainant, in suit to enjoin violation of contract to sell complainant's gasoline exclusively, had an adequate remedy at law against defendant, was to be determined by defendant's solvency, the difficulty of ascertaining complainant's damages, multiplicity of suits entailed, and continuing character of injury.—Phillips Oil Co. v. § 82. Contracts for Personal Services

a. Breach by employer
b. Breach by employee

a. Breach by Employer

The breach of a contract for personal services ordinarily cannot be enjoined at the suit of the employee.

Subject to certain limitations or exceptions either actual or apparent,[51] it is very generally held that an employee, whether classed as an agent or as a servant, cannot enforce a contract for service by enjoining a breach on the part of his employer.[52] The employer will not be enjoined from dismissing an employee or from refusing to continue to employ him, even though such action is a direct violation of contract.[53] Regardless of contract, a court of equity will not compel an employer to continue in his employ a servant or agent distasteful to him or be bound by the acts of an agent whom he no longer desires to represent him.[54] A fortiori no injunction will be granted when complainant has given cause for dismissal.[55] If there is any doubt as to the existence of the contract right or as to the fact of a breach on the part of the employer, the case against complainant is all the stronger.[56]

b. Breach by Employee

(2) Services requiring no special skill
(3) Services requiring special skill
(4) Services of theatrical performer
(5) Services of baseball player

(1) In General

A breach of a contract by an employee ordinarily will not be restrained, and injunctive relief is improper where it is prohibited by statute.

A contract to render personal services ordinarily cannot be specifically enforced directly by a court of equity; nor will it indirectly or negatively by means of an injunction restrain the violation of a contract by compelling the performance from day to day by the employee of his engagement.[57] In some of the early decisions, both English and American, it was held that, where a contract contains both an affirmative covenant to work for a designated party for a certain time and a negative covenant not to work for anyone else during that period, the court, being unable to enforce specifically the affirmative covenant, was without power to enforce by injunction the negative covenant;[58] but, as shown infra subdivision b (3) of this section, this rule has in general been abrogated by later decisions in the same jurisdiction.

Statutes prohibiting injunction. Where prohibited by statute, an injunction may not issue to restrain an individual employee from quitting or threatening to quit his employment in violation of his contract of employment.[59]

(2) Services Requiring No Special Skill

A breach by an employee of a contract for personal services requiring no special skill or qualification will not be enjoined.

In the case of contracts to render services requiring no special skill or qualification, a breach of the contract by the employee will not be enjoined,[60] at least where the employee is not in possession of trade secrets or confidential information of the employer;[61] and this is also true, although he has expressly agreed to work for no one else or to devote all his time to the service of complainant.[62] The rule applies, although the employee showed bad faith in quitting and an utter disregard of contract rights and of the public convenience.[63]

The mere fact that the employee is financially irresponsible will not justify an injunction restraining a breach of covenant not to work for others than the employer.[64]

(3) Services Requiring Special Skill

The breach of a contract to render special, unique, or extraordinary personal services may be restrained, and in some jurisdictions the breach may be enjoined, although the contract contains no express negative covenant not to work for others.

Unless injunctive relief is prohibited by statute,[65] it is now very generally held subject to certain limitations in some jurisdictions that, where one contracts to render special, unique, or extraordinary personal services requiring special merit or qualification, or where the services to be rendered are purely intellectual, or are peculiar and individual in

Effect of recovery of damages for wrongful discharge
One employed for twelve-month period in business of manufacturing and selling ice under contract requiring him not to engage in business of selling or delivering ice in district in competition with his employer, and who, after being wrongfully discharged, recovered damages, was precluded from any course not consistent with his employment during the twelve-month period, and injunction was properly issued to restrain him from selling ice in employer's district during the term for which his employment was to run.—Southern Properties v. Betrayal of trust and confidence
The general rule has no application to a case involving the betrayal of a trust and confidence reposed in the employee by his employer by attempting to take away for his own benefit and in direct violation of his express contract his employer's customers, knowledge of whom he had acquired in the course of the performance of his duty as an employee.—Cahill v. their character, and where in case of default the same service is not to be obtained from others, although equity will not interfere to enforce specific performance of the whole contract, yet because the damage will be irreparable it will exert its preventive power and enjoin the employee from working for others or doing positive acts in violation of the contract.[66] Especially should an injunction be granted if in addition the services involve trade secrets.[67] It has been held that an injunction will not be refused because of the balancing of the conveniences, as such doctrine applies only to motions pendente lite.[68]

Nevertheless it has been held that an injunction will not be granted restraining a servant from devoting his services to another where complainant does not offer to continue the servant in his employ,[69] where the contract is unenforceable against defendant by reason of his minority,[70] where there is want of mutuality of remedy,[71] where no substantial benefit to complainant could arise from the granting of an injunction,[72] or where it is not necessary for the protection of the covenantee or reasonable and equitable under the facts of the case.[73]

Necessity for express negative covenant. In a number of decisions where the general rule is laid down, the contract which furnished the basis of the litigation contained an express negative covenant on the part of the employee not to work for anyone else during the period covered by the contract.[74] In other decisions in which an injunction was granted, it did not appear whether or not the contract contained an express negative covenant, the necessary inference being that the court considered a covenant of this character unnecessary;[75] and in many decisions it has been directly held that, even in the absence of an express negative covenant, the contract being such that its performance must necessarily prevent any further service for others, a negative covenant not to work for others during the period covered by the contract will be implied and will be enforced by injunction.[76] However, some decisions take the view that in the absence of an express negative covenant none can be implied, and that no injunction against the breach of a contract not containing such a covenant can be awarded.[77]

An author, editorial writer, or columnist may be enjoined from breaking his contract for literary work.[78]

Expiration of contract period
Equity properly took jurisdiction to hear case on application for injunction against violation of defendant's agreement not to work for others than plaintiff during term of personal service contract in force when bill was filed, although the period provided by the contract for the services of defendant expired before the case was ripe for final decree.—Rooney v. Weeks, 194 N.E. 666, 290 Mass. 18.

(4) Services of Theatrical Performer

The breach of a contract of a theatrical performer will be restrained where the services require special qualification and cannot be duplicated by others, at least where the contract contains an express negative covenant not to perform for others.

Some of the earlier decisions laid down the rule that a theatrical performer who is engaged to perform for a theatrical manager for a specified time would in no circumstances be enjoined from performing for a rival theater, even though he had specifically agreed not to do so, the view being taken that the court, being without power to enforce specifically the affirmative covenant, is equally without power to enforce by injunction the negative covenant;[79] but, as hereinafter considered, this rule has very generally undergone substantial modification where the services in question are such as to require special skill.

Services requiring special skill. In the absence of statute prohibiting injunctive relief, the general rule now is that, where the performer's services are to be regarded as requiring special qualification and not to be duplicated by others, so that the damage caused by the breach is irreparable, a specific negative agreement not to perform for another will be enforced by injunction;[80] and in some decisions this rule has been extended to cases where the contract contains no express negative covenant but where the agreement not to perform can be implied from the impossibility of performing in two places at once;[81] but this extension of the rule has been refused in other decisions which hold that no injunction will issue to restrain the performance of services for another manager during the period of the contract, in the absence of an express covenant not to do so.[82]

Even where the contract contains an express negative covenant, it will not be enforced by injunction where the manager has himself breached the contract;[83] where it appears that the manager will be unable to pay for the services contracted for;[84] where the party seeking relief is not bound by the contract;[85] where the contract is one-sided and unconscionable;[86] where the contract is indefinite and uncertain;[87] or where the parties have stipulated for the damages to be paid in order to have the privilege of performing elsewhere.[88] Where the granting of an injunction would confer no substantial benefit on complainant, defendant should not be restrained.[89]

Services not requiring special skill. In accordance with the general rule considered supra subdivision b (2) of this section, an injunction will not be granted to restrain an actor under contract with a theatrical manager to perform for a designated time from acting for another manager during that time where his services are not special and unique and can be replaced by hiring others in his stead.[90]

(5) Services of Baseball Player

The breach of a contract of a baseball player may be restrained where his services are of a peculiar value and difficult of substitution, at least where the contract contains an express negative covenant not to play for another team.

In the absence of a statute prohibiting injunctive relief, where the services of a baseball player are

(1) Where a theatrical contract gave plaintiff the right to place defendant actors in vaudeville, although at the time the contract was executed defendants expressed a desire to be featured in a play, which plaintiff's manager agreed to do as soon as he could secure a suitable play, it was no defense to an action to enjoin defendants from performing for rival producers that defendants were kept in vaudeville and were not put into a play.—Shubert Theatrical Co. v. Gallagher, 201 N.Y. S. 577, 206 App.Div. 514.

(2) In an action to enjoin actors under an exclusive contract with plaintiff from performing for rival producers, it was no defense that, although the contract called for performance not later than September 29, defendants were notified to appear for performance on October 3, in view of defendants' previous letter, practically repudiating the contract unless they should be placed in "production" before January 1, and other conduct tending to prove an intention to waive notice of opening on September 29.—Shubert Theatrical Co. v. of such a unique character, and display such a special knowledge, skill, and ability as render them of peculiar value to the owner of the ball club, and so difficult of substitution that their loss will produce irreparable injury to him, a player who commits a breach of an express negative covenant not to play for another team during the period fixed by the contract will be enjoined,[91] and it has been held that an injunction may issue, even though the contract for his services contains no express covenant not to play on another team.[92] On the other hand, when the services are not so regarded, no injunction will be granted.[93] In any event relief by injunction will be denied where the contract is indefinite or ambiguous,[94] or is lacking in mutuality and fairness.[95]

§ 83. Contracts for Sale of Chattels

An injunction usually will not be granted to restrain the breach of a contract for the sale of ordinary chattels.

In case of sales of ordinary marketable chattels, the contract will not be indirectly enforced by injunction, even though it contains a distinct negative term for the reason that the remedy at law is regarded as adequate.[96] On the other hand, a negative agreement in a contract for the sale of chattels may be specifically enforced where the circumstances are such that a breach of the covenant would result in irreparable injury.[97]

d. What constitutes breach of contract

a. In General

An injunction may issue to restrain the breach of a contract in restraint of trade where the contract is not against public policy and is otherwise valid.

Where a contract in restraint of trade is contrary to public policy and void, as considered in Contracts §§ 238–258, a breach thereof will be not enjoined;[98] and this is also the case where the contract is wholly unreasonable.[99] On the other hand, if a contract in restraint of trade is not against public

(1) Where five-year contract, requiring defendant refiner to furnish gasoline to plaintiff, its authorized dealer, had been performed more than year before defendant sought to terminate it after plaintiff had begun to cut prices, plaintiff's remedy at law for breach was plain, complete, and adequate, precluding injunction requiring specific performance, although contract term was rendered somewhat indefinite by provision authorizing defendant to cancel it if plaintiff's mother canceled her outstanding garage lease to defendant. —Cappetta v. policy and is otherwise valid, a breach of such contract may in a proper case be enjoined.[1] Where the injunction cannot conveniently be enforced, it will not be granted;[2] and the conduct of complainant may bar his right to an injunction to which he would otherwise be entitled.[3]

Discretion of court. The granting or refusal of an injunction to prevent the breach of a contract in restraint of trade ordinarily is within the discretion of the court.[4]

Where a contract in restraint of trade is divisible and valid as to one part, although invalid as to the other, an injunction against a breach of the valid part is proper.[5]

Doubtful rights. Before the court will enjoin a breach of a contract in restraint of trade, there must be no doubt about its validity,[6] and its existence and terms must be satisfactorily established,[7] as must also the fact of the breach or threatened breach.[8]

Adequacy of consideration. An injunction against the breach of a contract in restraint of trade will not be refused on the ground that the consideration is inadequate,[9] unless the inadequacy is so great as to shock the conscience of the chancellor and to indicate that unfair and fraudulent advantage was taken.[10]

Breach actual or threatened. Where there has been no breach and none is threatened, no injunction will issue.[11] It is not necessary, however, to wait until the contract has actually been violated before bringing suit to enjoin the breach;[12] an injunction may issue where it is shown that defendant is making preparations to perform acts in violation of the contract.[13]

b. Covenants in Contracts for Sale of Business

(1) In general
(2) Sale of medical or dental practice
(3) Agreement not to use same business name

(1) In General

The breach of an agreement in a contract for the sale of a business that the seller will not compete with the purchaser may be enjoined where the restraint imposed by the contract is reasonable and no greater than is necessary to protect the purchaser.

The most usual instance of a contract in restraint of trade is a contract for the sale of a business with its good will, with an agreement on the part of the vendor not to open up a competing business of the same kind for a certain time within a certain area; if the restraint is reasonable and is no greater than is necessary for the proper protection of the purchaser in enjoying his property a breach may be enjoined.[14] It has been held that, even in the absence of an express contract not to interfere with the enjoyment of the good will so sold, a contract not to do so is necessarily implied, and such interference will be enjoined,[15] although there is also authority that a vendor will not be enjoined from setting up a rival business, where the sale of the business and good will is without any express restrictive agreement.[16] The vendor may be enjoined from entering into a partnership[17] or having any connection with a corporation formed by him to conduct a rival business.[18] It is not a reason for refusing an injunction that the business is more extensive than the purchaser can attend to.[19]

Where an established business has been sold with its good will and there is a valid covenant not to compete, a breach is regarded as the controlling factor and injunctive relief follows almost as a matter of course.[20] In such cases the damage is pre-

Reasons for rule

(1) The rule is based on the theory that one who has sold a business, agreeing to remain out of a like line for a definite term, cannot destroy the good will with which he has agreed that he will not interfere.—Peterson v. Johnson Nut Co., 283 N.W. 561, 204 Minn. 300—32 C.J. p 219 note 38.

(2) Interference by a court of equity is necessary because the parties cannot be placed in statu quo.—Locke v. Murdock, 151 P. 298, 20 N.M. 522, L.R.A.1917B 267.

(3) Damages afford no adequate remedy to the injured party, the damages not being susceptible of proof or exact computation, and the injury caused by the act complained of being a constantly recurring one for which multiplying suits at law could afford but an inadequate remedy.

Meaning of city blocks within covenant

On motion for injunction pendente lite against operating garage, restricted ten-block area will be determined by standard block in land book.—Gru Corporation v. Right-In Garage, 244 N.Y.S. 484, 137 Misc. 139.

Mutuality of remedy

An injunction to restrain defendant from breaching a covenant not to engage in a competing business within a restricted territory would not be denied under the so-called negative doctrine of mutuality on ground that, if defendant had sought to enjoin plaintiff, remedy would have been denied, since no duty was imposed on plaintiff to refrain from entering into defendant's reserved territory, where adequate relief could be granted without hardship on either of parties, since plaintiff, by invoking equitable powers of the court, assumed duty of performance and thereby subjected itself to any proper conditions imposed by court in granting relief.—Peterson v. Johnson Nut Co., 283 N.W. 561, 204 Minn. 300.

Implied covenant not to interfere with good will see Good Will §§ 7, 12.

Sale by corporation as sale by real owner

(1) Where defendant, who was engaged in insurance business, sold good will of business to his own corporation in 1933, and thereafter in 1937 good will of defendant's corporation was sold to another corporation, and it appeared that defendant had so dominated his corporation that such corporation was his alter ego, defendant would be considered as not having parted with his good will until 1937, as regards right of purchaser of good will from corporation in 1939 to enjoin defendant from directly soliciting his former customers.—J. L. Cooper & Co. v. Anchor Securities Co., 113 P.2d 845, 9 Wash.2d 45.

(2) Disregarding corporate entity generally see Corporations § 6.

Extent of restraint

(1) The restraint imposed by the injunction should go no further than is necessary to protect the buyer.—Martino v. Pontone, 170 N.E. 67, 270 Mass. 158.

(2) Where defendant, after selling a small grocery store, with the good will, opened competing store in neighborhood, restraint should be confined to area within which store reasonably sought and supplied customers.—Martino v. Pontone, supra.

sumed to be irreparable,[21] and the remedy at law is considered inadequate.[22] It is not necessary that the buyer first prove special pecuniary damages[23] or show an actual loss of customers who might in any event have discontinued their patronage.[24] Injunctive relief may be given, even though only nominal damages are shown[25] or although no actual damage is shown.[26] However, there is also authority that the mere breach of the covenant does not justify injunctive relief without a finding that the purchaser was or would be irreparably injured or that he had no adequate remedy at law.[27]

Complainant's breach or laches. Complainant will not be entitled to restrain a breach where he has himself been guilty of a substantial breach of contract[28] or of acquiescence or inexcusable laches.[29]

Provision for penalty, liquidated damages, etc. An injunction may be granted although a restrictive covenant provides that in case of breach the covenantor shall be subject to a penalty[30] or liquidated damages.[31] A contrary doctrine has, however, been maintained in some cases.[32] Covenants may be construed from their terms and the surrounding circumstances to mean that the seller shall have the privilege of renewing business on payment of a specified sum so as to preclude the issuance of an injunction.[33]

Where the purchaser of a business has abandoned it, a preliminary injunction will not be granted to restrain the seller from violating a covenant not to engage in the same business within the stated period, even though complainant intends to resume business as soon as convenient.[34]

Retiring partners. A retiring partner who agrees for a consideration not to open up a competing business may be enjoined from so doing.[35]

Effect of bankruptcy
In suit to restrain breach of a mutual covenant not to engage in competing business within reserved territory, wherein covenant was part of a contract for sale of part of defendant's business and contract was assigned to a corporation which, with buyer, subsequently became bankrupt, such bankruptcy did not effect a termination of contract and constitute an "anticipatory breach" so as to justify denial of relief sought, since corporation had no duty to perform requiring affirmative action on its part and its lack of cash or physical assets was immaterial.—Peterson v. Johnson Nut Co., 283 N.W. 561, 204 Minn. 300.

29. Complainant need not sue at once on obtaining knowledge of breach of the covenant, but he is entitled to reasonable time in which to consider whether it is advisable to sue.—Wright v. Scotton, 121 A. 69, 13 Del.Ch. 402, 31 A.L.R. 1162, affirming Scotton v. Wright, 117 A. 131, 13 Del.Ch. 214.

Plaintiff held not barred
(1) Plaintiff is not barred by laches where the delay in instituting action was brief and where there was no proof of injury to defendants by reason of the delay.—Montgomery Bros. v. Montgomery, 112 A. 474, 269 Pa. 332.

(2) Laches precluding school corporation's assertion of contract clause precluding ex-employee from soliciting pupils was not shown by inaction for six months after vice president, ignorant of contract, learned of ex-employee's soliciting.—Becker College of Business Administration and Secretarial Science v. Gross, 183 N.E. 765, 281 Mass. 355.

(3) Seller of grocery store who in violation of covenant conducted like business within three-year period within one-mile radius could not claim laches on part of buyer's assignees who sought to enjoin seller from conducting such business where it did not appear that assignees acquiesced in breach of covenant or that delay in bringing suit worked disadvantage to seller.—Adamowicz v. Iwanicki, 190 N.E. 711, 286 Mass. 453.

Particular businesses. The jurisdiction of courts of equity to enjoin breaches of contract whereby one party has sold to another his business and good will with agreement not to open up a competing establishment within certain limits as to time and territory has been applied in a wide variety of businesses,[36] as, for instance, an abstract business,[37] a bakery business,[38] a banking business,[39] a barber business,[40] a blacksmith business,[41] a butcher business,[42] a cleaning and dyeing business,[43] a furniture business,[44] a garage business,[45] an ice business,[46] an iron and tin business,[47] a lawyer's practice,[48] a newspaper business,[49] a photograph gallery,[50] a plumbing business,[51] a restaurant business,[52] a taxicab business,[53] a transfer business,[54] and an undertaking business.[55]

Persons entitled to injunction. A covenant not to engage in the same business forms a valuable part of the good will of the business and the benefit of the covenant will pass to a subsequent purchaser of the good will as incidental thereto without special mention, as considered in Good Will § 13, so as to enable the subsequent purchaser to maintain a suit to restrain a breach of the covenant,[56] and the suit may not be maintained by the original purchaser.[57] However, there is authority that in the absence of an assignment of the covenant a subsequent purchaser of the business may not sue to restrain a breach.[58] At any rate, a subsequent purchaser of the business is entitled to an injunc-

In Pennsylvania

(1) A subsequent purchaser of the business may sue to restrain a breach of the covenant although the covenant is not expressly assigned to him by the buyer.—Ebert v. Kaufmann, 17 Pa.Dist. 156.

(2) An agreement of sale of a business wherein the seller agrees not to enter into a similar or competitive business within the county is not enforceable by a vendee of the purchaser of the business.—Heiney v. Shindell, 1 Monroe L.R., Pa., 146.

tion to restrain the breach of an express covenant not to engage in the same business where the covenant has been expressly assigned to him on the resale of the business.[59] Purchasers of corporate stock from the stockholders under an agreement that the sale should include the good will have been held proper parties to enforce the agreement.[60]

Persons who may be restrained. Where circumstances warrant the granting of an injunction, it may be issued against the seller or person who made the restrictive covenant.[61] The court may restrain the party violating the contract not only from breaching the terms of the contract but also from employing or combining with others to accomplish the same result.[62]

Respecting complainant's right to enjoin persons other than the seller or maker of a restrictive covenant, the authorities are not uniform; it has generally been held that an injunction should run against only those who are parties to the restrictive covenant.[63] Thus it has been stated that neither a corporation formed by the seller of a business to conduct a similar business nor those interested therein other than the seller may be enjoined.[64] The wife of the seller has the right to carry on a competing business under her own name,[65] provided she does not represent her goods as the goods of the business which her husband has sold.[66]

However, injunctions have been granted against those who, although not parties to the original sale, join with the seller in his subsequent breach,[67] as, for instance, a corporation formed to carry on a rival business by the employment of the seller therein.[68] Injunctions have been granted also against persons who, although not parties to the restrictive covenant, cause the covenantor to violate it with the direct result of giving themselves an advantage in their business.[69]

Liability limited to buyer or estate
Where seller of theater equipment agreed not to reënter theater business for certain period as "affects" buyer or his estate, and after buyer's death the community survivor made one-year lease to third person for fixed rent and assigned the noncompetition agreement, injunction did not lie where buyer's estate suffered no financial injury from seller's reentry into business, since such assignment could not change noncompetition contract to read "as affects lessee or his estate" or enlarge the contract.—Yates v. (2) Sale of Medical or Dental Practice

The breach of an agreement in a contract for the sale of a medical or dental practice that the seller will not compete may be enjoined where the restraint imposed by the contract is reasonable.

In the case of a contract by a physician or dentist not to reopen practice after the sale thereof, he may be enjoined from practicing again within the agreed limits, if they are reasonable,[70] or from doing any other act preventing the vendee from enjoying the benefit of the contract.[71] It is not necessary for complainant to prove that the consideration was adequate,[72] but it is sufficient that some legal consideration appears.[73] It is ordinarily assigned as a reason for the assumption of jurisdiction by equity that the remedy at law is inadequate[74] by reason of the uncertainty in any calculation of damages,[75] and because of the multiplicity of suits that would be necessary to obtain redress.[76]

According to some decisions, where no time is mentioned in the contract, the covenant will endure for the lifetime of the grantor;[77] but it has been held that, in an action to restrain a physician from competing with another contrary to a contract, it was proper for the court to anticipate the probability of the other physician retiring from practice, and to limit the period of restriction to the time he was practicing.[78]

(3) Agreement Not to Use Same Business Name

The breach of a contract not to open up a competing business under a certain name may be enjoined.

A contract not to open up a competing business under a certain name and style is valid and will be enforced by injunction,[79] and, even though there is no term in the contract to that effect, if the good will of the business is a part of the subject matter of the sale the vendor will be enjoined from using the former name in such a way as to injure the enjoyment by the vendee of the rights he purchased.[80] A provision in the contract for liquidated damages does not necessarily preclude the issuance of an injunction.[81]

Sale of hospital
The action of the vendors of a hospital in one county, in accepting business from that county at hospital constructed three hundred yards over county line, in violation of assignment of good will under hospitalization contracts, which was provided for by contract of sale, constituted violation of restrictive covenant of contract for sale of hospital that vendors would not indirectly or directly engage in operation of hospital within county for ten years, against which vendees were entitled to injunction.—Johnson v. c. Covenants in Contracts of Employment

The breach of an express agreement by an employee, contained in a contract of hiring not to engage in the same or similar business after the termination of his employment, may, under proper circumstances, be enjoined.

Where an employee's express covenant not to engage in a competing business or to solicit orders from the employer's customers after the termination of his employment is not against public policy, as considered in Contracts § 254, a breach of the covenant may, under proper circumstances, be enjoined,[82] provided the restraint is reasonable and

Adequacy of remedy at law

(1) The reason usually assigned for granting injunctive relief is the inadequacy of the remedy at law.

Vt.—Dyar Sales & Machinery Co. v. Bleiler, 175 A. 27, 106 Vt. 425.
32 C.J. p 220 note 70 [a].

(2) However, the fact that a legal remedy was available, which, if pursued, would have secured corporation adequate relief, does not operate to deny it right to injunctive relief against its employees, appropriating and using property intrusted to them, and the revenues therefrom and engaging in competition with it in violation of their contracts.—Red Ball Stage Lines v. Griffin, Tex.Civ.App., 275 S.W. 454.

Tests in determining enforceability

(1) Whether agreement by employee not to compete with employer after termination of employment will be enforced is determined by whether basic contract is fair and equitable, whether restrictive covenant is reasonably necessary for protection of basic contract, and whether, in absence of trade secrets or peculiar confidences, other grounds exist for holding irreparable injury to plaintiff as consequence of defendant's act.—Briggs v. Boston, D.C. Iowa, 15 F.Supp. 763.

(2) On question of enforcing employee's contract not to sell in certain territory on ceasing employment, interests of employer, employee, and public must be considered.—Deuerling v. City Baking Co., 141 A. 542, 155 Md. 280, 67 A.L.R. 993.

(3) Where, in consideration of defendant's agreement not to engage in the undertaking business in competition with plaintiff, she employed him as an undertaker, the test to determine whether there was error in enjoining defendant from engaging in such business on his own account is to inquire whether it was the reasonable thing to do, considering the situation of the parties, their rights, and duties each owed the other, and the loss that defendant would sustain if enjoined as compared with plaintiff's loss if injunction is denied.—Spaulding v. Mayo, 122 A. 899, 81 N.H. 85.

Temporary injunction

(1) Corporation was not entitled to judgment restraining individual from conducting furniture and undertaking business in certain counties for ten years in violation of contract, where corporation was required under contract to employ individual for ten years, and question whether individual voluntarily relinquished his employment or was discharged by corporation without cause was in dispute, since in such case parties' rights will be determined only after trial of issues.—Voorhees & Hobart v. Hobart, 295 N.Y.S. 616, 251 App.Div. 111.

(2) Contract prohibiting employee from competing with employer for one year after termination of employment, and providing that if legal proceedings were necessary to enforce covenant employee could be enjoined for one year from date of final adjudication, did not entitle employee to continue violation of his contract for entire period up to final decree so as to preclude issuance of temporary restraining order, but by violating covenant employee exposed himself to further restraint.—J. I. Kislak, Inc., v. Artof, 176 A. 899, 13 N.J.Misc. 129.

Injunction in favor of third person

Injunction to restrain former employee from engaging in competing business was properly refused to former partners who had transferred business, but not employment contract, to corporation.—West v. Jacobs, 178 N.E. 615, 277 Mass. 406.

Injunction against third persons

(1) Persons with notice may be enjoined from employing person in a business contrary to his contract.

32 C.J. p 220 note 71 [d].

(2) Injunction to restrain third person inducing breach of contract see infra § 89.

(3) Where contract between principal and agent bound agent not to sell competitors' products in specified territory for year after termination of employment, and agent's contract with subagent was made "subject to" terms thereof, subagent could be enjoined from selling competitors' products within year after his employment ended.—Sanitary Appliance Co. v. French, Tex.Civ.App., 58 S.W.2d 159, error dismissed.

is not broader than is necessary for the employer's protection,[83] and enforcement does not impose undue hardship on the employee,[84] and provided injunctive relief is not limited or prohibited by statute.[85]

Injunctive relief will not be granted in every case to compel an employee to fulfill his agreement.[86] Injunctive relief will be denied where the Reasonableness depends on facts of each case.—Saltman v. Smith, 46 N.E.2d 550, 313 Mass. 135.

What may be done

Reasonableness and fairness of a contract are measured by what may be done under the terms thereof and not by what has been done.—Love v. Miami Laundry Co., 160 So. 32, 118 Fla. 137.

Necessity is controlling criterion of extent to which equity will enjoin breach of negative covenant, whether express or implied, in contract.—Schmidl v. Central Laundry & Supply Co., 13 N.Y.S.2d 817.

Propriety of territorial restriction in employment contract on employee's right to compete with employer after leaving employment must be considered in connection with parties' circumstances and employee's activities, which must not be restrained in territory wherein his employment did not take him or give him opportunity for undue competitive advantages over employer.—Wisconsin Ice & Coal Co. v. Lueth, 250 N.W. 819, 213 Wis. 42.

Fact that covenant is unlimited as to time will not preclude grant of injunction restraining its violation where area of restraint is limited and reasonable.—Foster v. White, 290 N.Y.S. 394, 248 App.Div. 451, affirmed 7 N.E.2d 710, 273 N.Y. 596.

Temporary injunction

In suit to restrain former employee of laundry from soliciting employer's customers for period of five years, where plaintiff did not establish a clear and convincing claim of reasonableness of covenant, granting of injunctive relief should await trial of action.—New York Linen Supply & Laundry Co. v. Schachter, 212 N.Y.S. 72, 125 Misc. 805.

Term "radius," in provisions of employment contracts that employees should not engage in same business as employer in certain city or within five-mile radius of any city wherein employer had place of business after termination of employment, was used in sense of any area bounded by prescribed limits, not in geometric sense of line drawn from center of circle to its periphery, so as to authorize injunction against engaging in such business within certain cities and adjacent areas for five miles from cities' boundaries.—Saltman v. Smith, 46 N.E.2d 550, 313 Mass. 135.

Discharge in time of business depression

Employer who discharged manager of meat department of store without cause in time of business depression was not entitled to injunction restraining manager from violating contract whereby, in consideration of employment and weekly compensation, manager agreed that, if his employment should terminate, he would not for one year thereafter be employed in meat business within radius of two miles of store.—Economy Grocery Stores Corporation v. Courts should proceed with caution in giving effect to contract of employee not to engage in similar work after termination of employment.—Dyar Sales & Machinery Co. v. Bleiler, 175 A. 27, 106 Vt. 425.

Courts are slow to grant injunctive relief, for contracts limiting a party's right to engage in a particular agreement is void,[87] where the employee has not covenanted to refrain from entering a rival business[88] or he has been released from his agreement,[89] where the agreement is uncertain[90] or is wanting in mutuality of obligation[91] or is harsh, unjust, or unreasonable,[92] or where plaintiff has first materially breached the contract[93] or has been guilty of unfair or unjust conduct.[94]

Consideration. Injunctive relief against the breach of a covenant contained in a contract of hiring will be denied where there is no consideration to support the employee's promise,[95] but inadequacy of consideration is not ground for refusing relief unless it is so grossly inadequate as to be evidence of fraud.[96]

Necessity of showing irreparable injury. Some decisions have drawn a distinction between contracts of this character and those for the sale of a business considered supra subdivision b (1) of this section, on the ground that the breach of a like covenant in an employment contract does not so readily indicate irreparable injury to the employer;[97] and the burden is placed by these decisions on complainant to show affirmatively that he had sustained, or was likely to sustain, irreparable damage.[98] However, it has also been held that it is not necessary to show actual damage by instances of successful competition, but it is sufficient if such competition, in violation of the covenant, may result in injury;[99] and irreparable injury need not be shown where the services of the employee have been of such a character that he gained knowledge of his employer's business methods and secrets,[1] and where the purpose of the subsequent employment was to obtain the benefit of those methods and secrets.[2]

Provision of milkman's contract with dairy company that, if milkman should become dissatisfied with milk route, he should return it to dairy company without compensation did not mean that after milkman was discharged or had quit he should refrain from soliciting customers on such route for himself or others, and hence dairy company was not entitled to injunction to restrain milkman, after being discharged, from soliciting customers for rival company.—Snow Cap Dairy v. Injunction to prevent use or disclosure of trade secrets by former employee see infra § 148.

Trade secrets. An injunction may issue to restrain the breach of an employment contract not to engage in a rival business after termination of the employment where the services of the employee have been of such a character that he gained knowledge of his employer's business methods and secrets, the disclosure of which to a rival would result in irreparable injury to the employer,[3] and where it further appears that the purpose of the subsequent employment was to obtain the benefit of those secrets, and that there is imminent danger that through such subsequent employment such secrets would be disclosed.[4] In some decisions injunctive relief against the breach of an employee's covenant not to engage in a rival business after termination of his employment has been denied where there was no showing that the employee possessed trade secrets or confidential information of his employer.[5]

Liquidated damages. An injunction may issue, although the contract provides for liquidated damages in case of breach,[6] even though injunctive relief has been denied where an action for liquidated damages would afford full and adequate relief.[7]

Services requiring no special skill. The covenant of the employee may be enforced by injunction, although his services are not of a unique and special nature,[8] although it has been stated that restrictive covenants against an employee's acceptance of other employment after termination of his contract are rarely of equitable cognizance where the employment is of an ordinary kind.[9]

Voluntarily or involuntarily quitting service. Where the restriction is one that would otherwise be enforced, it is not a ground to refuse an injunction to restrain its breach that the employee may have voluntarily withdrawn from his employment with the consent of his employer,[10] or that the employee was discharged before the expiration of his time of employment where the discharge was for good cause.[11] It has been further held that it is immaterial whether the employee left the employment voluntarily or was discharged without cause,[12] although a discharge without cause may be a factor prompting the court to deny injunctive relief.[13] The fact that the employee is discharged without the notice provided for by the contract does not affect the employer's right to an injunction where he tendered to the employee pay for the full time of the period for which notice was required to be given, which amount the employee refused.[14]

Solvency of employee. If grounds exist for an injunction, the fact that the employee is solvent will not bar the right thereto.[15]

Relations with customers

Employer's right depends on whether employee acquired such intimate relations with employer's customers or obtained such knowledge of employer's business that use of acquaintanceship or knowledge thus obtained in competing business in breach of agreement would result in irreparable injury to employer for which he had no adequate remedy at law.—Dyar Sales & Machinery Co. v. Violation of agreement by employer
A tree surgery company, which had instructed salesman in its business after he had signed a contract not to compete with it for certain period after ceasing to be employed by it was entitled to a preliminary injunction to restrain him from working for a competitor, notwithstanding salesman alleged that company violated employment agreement by failing to credit him with commissions to which he was entitled, reduced his drawing account, and failed to reassign him to territory promised him, where those allegations did not appear to be supported by specific facts.—Davey Tree Expert Co. v. Injury to good will
Where exercise of stenographic reporting business by defendant would impair good will of plaintiff's business, and latter's damages would be inadequate and speculative, defendant's covenant in contract of employment not to engage in similar business will be enforced.—Edgecomb v. Volume of business
Fact that stenographic reporting constitutes only one sixth of total business of plaintiff seeking to enjoin former employee from doing such work in competition with it, in violation of covenant, and constitutes all of defendant's business, is no reason for refusing injunction.—Sarco Co. of New Jersey v. d. What Constitutes Breach of Contract

(1) In general
(2) Engaging in business in name of another

(1) In General

A contract not to engage in a particular business or calling may be breached by acts in violation of the spirit and intent, as well as of the letter, of the contract.

Within the rule discussed supra subdivisions a–c of this section, permitting an injunction to restrain a breach or threatened breach of contracts in restraint of trade, it constitutes a breach of the contract to enter into a business substantially the same as the one transferred,[36] or to do acts in violation of the spirit and intent of the contract, even though not of its letter.[37] The acceptance of unsolicited business may constitute a breach of the covenant.[38]

Fact that plaintiff was member of laundry organization whose members would like to see plaintiff prevail did not prevent maintenance of suit to enjoin former employee from violating contract not to solicit plaintiff's customers.—Brannen v. Bouley, 172 N.E. 104, 272 Mass. 67.

In view of probable unemployment which would result from granting injunction laundry company was not entitled to injunction to restrain its former truck drivers from violating provision of contract of employment which forbade for one year their solicitation of patronage of company's customers for a competitor.—Love v. Employee of corporation unauthorized to practice
Dental corporation was not entitled to enjoin violation of agreement by former member not to practice operative dentistry within given period within given distance of corporate location, since corporation's charter could not authorize it to practice dentistry.—Dr. Allison, Dentist, Inc., v. Temporary injunction where facts in dispute
A preliminary injunction to restrain dentist from engaging in practice of orthodontia for three years in designated counties, in violation of contract of employment with complainant, would be denied, where dentist admitted his practice of orthodontia but evidence as to whether he was discharged without cause was disputed.—Weiss v. Mutual right to end contract
Where contract by which physician employed assistant gave both the right to terminate the contract on thirty days' notice, but where the assistant remained in physician's employ for two years under the contract, the assistant's covenant not to open an office in same territory for three years after termination of employment will be enforced by injunction, notwithstanding physician's right to terminate contract at any time on thirty days' notice.—Granger v. Craven, 199 N.W. 10, 159 Minn. 296, 52 A.L.R. 1356.

Advertising within restricted area
Where seller of District of Columbia furniture business agreed not to engage in furniture business in District for ten years and seller established new furniture store outside the District but in same metropolitan area, seller's advertisement of new store in District of Columbia newspapers violated the covenant and injunction against such advertisement and advertisement in District of Columbia telephone directory was properly granted.—Hartung v. Hilda Miller, Inc., 133 F.2d 401, 77 U.S.App.D.C. 164.

Employment contract providing that employee should not, for year after termination of employment, in any way attempt to divert or take away employer's customers covered case of striking employee who had broken contract by quitting without notice and who attempted to induce regular customers to cease their patronage, entitling employer to preliminary restraining order.—Perfect Laundry Co. v. Marsh, 191 A. 774, 121 N.J.Eq. 588, reversing 186 A. 470, 120 N.J.Eq. 508.

38. Physician who answers unsolicited calls acts in violation of a contract for the sale of his practice.—Gaul v. Hoffman, 5 Pa.Co. 355—32 C.J. p 223 note 20.

While there is some authority to the contrary,[39] it is very generally held that acting as president, manager, or superintendent of a competing business within the restricted territory is a violation of a contract for the sale of a business with its good will with an agreement not to open up a competing business within such territory.[40] There is also authority to the effect that the seller will be enjoined from acting as agent[41] or employee[42] of a competitor within the restricted territory, although there is authority to the contrary.[43]

On the other hand, various acts have been held not to constitute a breach of the covenant.[44] It has been held that it is not a breach for the seller to lend money to another to enable him to carry on a competing business,[45] that it is so doubtful that such act constitutes a breach that an injunction should be denied.[46] Ownership and operation of a competing business by a third person on property leased by the seller do not alone show a breach of the contract warranting injunctive relief.[47]

(2) Engaging in Business in Name of Another

A contract not to engage in a certain business may be breached by the seller engaging in the business in the name of another.

Within the rule permitting an injunction for the breach or threatened breach of contracts in restraint of trade a contract not to engage in a certain business may be broken by engaging in it under the name of another person; if the use of the new name is not bona fide, but is a mere subterfuge to escape the penalty for breach of contract, the carrying on of such business under the new name will be enjoined.[48] Although the carrying on of the business by one under color of his wife's name will be enjoined,[49] there is nothing to prevent the other spouse or a near relative from carrying on such business if it is conducted in good faith and not really on behalf of the one who was a party to the contract.[50]

§ 85. Contracts Not to Entice Away Employees or Customers

An injunction may issue to restrain the breach of an agreement not to entice away employees or to solicit customers of the plaintiff.

One who sold and transferred a long established retail mercantile business, together with its good will and the right to use the firm name under which it was conducted, and agreed to serve the purchaser as an employee for a stated term and use his best efforts to retain the employees and customers, will be enjoined from attempting to entice away employees or soliciting customers who were such at the time of the sale to trade with a competing firm

Defendant's business outside area

Where defendant sold electrical business and good will to plaintiff and covenanted not to engage in the electrical business or appurtenances thereto, or to be interested directly or indirectly for himself or anyone else in such business in a certain village, his subsequent acceptance of unsolicited contracts for installation of wiring and electrical equipment in such village violated the covenant, although his electrical business was located outside the restricted territory.—McCarty v. Constable, 223 N.Y.S. 484, 221 App.Div. 307.

44. Announcing former business association

Where agreement entered into in contemplation of divorce provided that husband was to become sole owner of a florist business conducted by the parties known as "Weigel's House of Flowers" and it was stipulated that wife should not maintain any place for sale of flowers in town of Palm Beach under the name of "Weigel" or any other name of which the word "Weigel" was a part, a card distributed by wife announcing retail store for sale of flowers which contained notation that wife was formerly associated with "Weigel's House of Flowers" was not a violation of stipulation contained in agreement, so as to authorize issuance of an injunction.—Weigel v. Wiener, 5 So.2d 447, 149 Fla. 231.

Mailing circulars to former customers

Where defendant sold share in partnership retail shoe business, and agreed not to engage in similar business on certain designated streets, fact that he opened new store beyond restricted area under his own name, and mailed circular letters to some of former customers, calling attention to previous connection with partnership business, did not show encroachment on good will of firm, calling for injunction.—Shangold v. Berson, 211 N.Y.S. 695, 125 Misc. 646.

§ 86. Contracts with Public Service Companies

A public service corporation may, under proper circumstances, be restrained from breaching its contract to supply water, gas, electricity, refrigeration, and telephone service.

Since the law can usually afford no adequate remedy in case of a breach of contracts for a supply of water for domestic, manufacturing, or other purposes, the shutting off of the supply may be enjoined.[52] The rule has no application where the cutting off of the service is in pursuance of valid regulations posted in compliance with the public service statutes,[53] or where no contract for service is shown to exist,[54] or where an alleged contract is indefinite in its terms as to price and duration, and where it does not appear that complainant was bound to take, or the city or defendant to furnish, water for any specific time.[55] A court of equity has power to grant a mandatory injunction restraining a water company from refusing to supply water to a complainant on the same terms on which it is supplied to others, where it clearly appears from the facts that such refusal is an unlawful discrimination, and that the injunction is the only adequate remedy available to complainant.[56] The user will be enjoined from taking more than he is entitled to when he cannot otherwise be prevented and the excess cannot be measured.[57]

Light, power, and gas. An injunction may be granted to prevent a public service corporation from wrongfully shutting off the supply of electricity or gas which such corporation is under contract to furnish, on the theory that the remedy at law is inadequate[58] and that the shutting off of the supply would cause irreparable injury.[59] It has been held that a city may maintain the action, although the citizens could redress the wrong individually or collectively,[60] and that a city may sue to restrain a public service company from exceeding the contract rates for the current supplied to the inhabitants.[61] Injunctive relief will be denied where under the contract the consumer is not obligated to take any current except at his own election.[62]

An injunction may issue to restrain a consumer from breaching a contract by which it bound itself to take all of the electrical power required in its business for a term of years from an electric power company at stated prices.[63] However, the court may decline to restrain the breach by the purchaser of a contract for the sale of electrical energy by one public utility company to another where it is impossible for the court to dispose of the whole controversy and an injunction would necessitate continuous supervision by the court.[64] A municipality will not be restrained from breaching a contract to take power where the contract was not authorized by the municipality,[65] where the

65. Power company contracting with operator of municipal light plant to furnish current was not entitled to sue for injunction against violation of contract by town where it appeared that town was not party to such contract inasmuch as opera-

remedy at law is adequate,[66] or where it is impossible for the city to perform the contract because of the transfer of its plant to a private company.[67]

Where a municipality has leased its gas plant to a private corporation, the city and its officers may be restrained from trespassing on, and taking possession of, the plant in violation of the lease.[68]

Refrigeration. A refrigerator company may be enjoined from summarily discontinuing service to the irreparable damage of a customer and the possible destruction of his product.[69]

Telephone or telegraph service. A contract made by a telephone company operating as a public service corporation, binding it to furnish service, may, in a proper case, be enforced by enjoining the company from discontinuing its service or removing its property from the patron's premises.[70] An injunction will be refused where plaintiff refuses to make payment in advance pursuant to valid rules of the company.[71]

The discontinuance of service by the telegraph company will not be restrained where the character of the use of the service is such as to justify an honest doubt as to its legality.[72]

§ 87. Covenants as to Use of Property

a. In general
b. Restrictive covenants as to use of land

a. In General

A covenant restricting the use of property, including personal property, may, in a proper case, be enforced by injunction.

Where a restrictive covenant with respect to the use of property is valid, it may in a proper case be enforced by injunction,[73] but only as against one under obligation not to violate the covenant.[74] Since a purchaser with notice takes title subject to the restriction, he may be enjoined from using the property in violation of the restriction.[75]

A person who has agreed that property shall not be subjected to a specified use has no standing in a court of equity when seeking an injunction which will in effect aid him in devoting the property to a use which violates his agreement.[76]

Personal property. A valid covenant restricting the use of personal property may, in a proper case, be enforced by injunction,[77] and as against a third person taking the property with notice of the restriction.[78] Thus an injunction may issue to re-tor's contract with town was insufficient to create agency authorizing him to contract on town's behalf.—Town of Hagerstown v. Liberty Light & Power Co., 150 N.E. 116, 84 Ind.App. 115.

Injunction against private company will not issue where it had not assumed obligation of municipality to take the power.—City of Holton v. Kansas Power & Light Co., supra.

68. Wrongful termination of contract by mayor

An injunction would lie to restrain the city of Philadelphia and its officers from trespassing on, and taking possession of, gas plant which was leased from the city and operated by gas company where the mayor, contrary to ordinance passed over his veto, purported to terminate the contract without paying for improvements made by the gas company which was required by contract between the city and company as a prerequisite to termination of the contract, where the record indicated probable magnitude of damage which would result to citizens and to the gas company if the threatened trespass were not restrained.—Philadelphia Gas Works Co. v. Decree resulting in bankruptcy of company

An injunction will be refused in a suit to enforce a telephone ordinance requiring service at specified rates where it conclusively appeared that, because of the increased cost of the service, due to the increased number of telephones, the ordinance rate was insufficient to pay the cost of the service and that a decree enforcing such rates would bankrupt the company.—Maryland Telephone & Telegraph Co. v. strain the breach of a restriction as to the price of goods[79] or as to the resale of goods,[80] including the place of resale[81] and the resale price.[82] Where a covenant not to sell personal property without giving complainant the first opportunity to buy it is valid, it may be enforced by injunction.[83]

(1) In General

A covenant restricting the use of land may, in a proper case, be enforced by injunction.

Where one has made a valid contract, clearly manifesting his intent, restricting the use to which he may put his land, a violation of such restriction may be restrained by injunction.[84] An owner whose land is subject to equitable restrictions cannot violate them and, when suit is brought against him, relieve his property from the restrictions by the payment of damages.[85] However, not every violation of a restrictive agreement relating to the use of realty will be restrained;[86] each case depends on its own circumstances.[87] Injunctive relief will be denied where the existence of a restrictive covenant is not established[88] or it is within the statute of frauds,[89] or where the circumstances have so changed as to defeat the original purpose of the covenant.[90]

Where a restrictive covenant is declared void in a proceeding brought for that purpose, it is not necessary in such proceeding to issue a permanent injunction to restrain the enforcement of the covenant where no attempt has been made to enforce it.[91] An invalid agreement by the owner of land to restrict the use of his property does not bar his right to injunctive relief to restrain interference with its use.[92]

The allowance of an injunction to restrain the breach of a covenant in a lease restricting the use of the property is considered in the C.J.S. title Landlord and Tenant § 307 et seq, also 36 C.J. p 50 note 64 et seq.

(2) Persons Entitled to Injunction

Where land is subdivided and distinct parcels are sold to separate grantees, with restrictions on its use, pursuant to a general plan of development, such restrictions may be enforced by injunction by one grantee against any other grantee with notice.

Within the rule permitting the enforcement of a restrictive covenant as to the use of land, when a restrictive covenant inserted by the grantor in a deed of a particular lot is part of a general scheme for the benefit and improvement of all the lands included in a larger tract it may be enforced by injunction against the purchaser of such lot or his grantees, at the suit of a holder of another lot in the tract who bought with notice of the general scheme and on the faith of the covenants inserted in the several deeds to carry it out;[93] and in these circumstances it is immaterial whether or not the covenant runs with the land.[94] It makes no difference that a party cannot maintain a suit at law in his own name to enforce the stipulation as a covenant or contract; a court of equity will give full effect to the stipulation, on the complaint of a party for whose benefit and protection, as owner of the land, the stipulation was intended.[95] While it is not necessary that complainant should be a direct party to the covenant sought to be enforced, it is necessary that he should have bought with notice of, and in reliance on, it, and that the covenant should have been entered into for the benefit of the land complainant owns, and not merely for the personal advantage of the original covenantee.[96] A grantee of land is not, because the grantor in subsequent conveyances inserted restrictive covenants, entitled to the benefit of such restrictions.[97]

A lessee of the land is entitled to enforce a covenant restricting the use of the land where the owners of the land refuse to do so and the lessee is or will be injured by the breach.[98]

(3) Persons Who May Be Enjoined

A restrictive covenant as to the use of land may be enforced by injunction against one acquiring the property with knowledge of the restriction.

Within the rule permitting the enforcement of a restrictive covenant as to the use of land, it is a general rule that where one by gift or purchase acquires real property from another, with knowledge of a previous contract made by him with a third person affecting the use of such property, injunction will lie to prevent the one so acquiring the property from using it in a manner inconsistent with the contract to the injury of the third person,[99] provided the circumstances have not so changed as to defeat the original purpose of the restriction and render nugatory, ineffectual, and unduly burdensome its further enforcement.[1] Within this rule undertenants and sublessees of the covenantor also may be enjoined.[2] Such agreements are capable of being enforced by injunction against all those who take the estate with notice of them, although they may not be, strictly speaking, real covenants, so as to run with the land,[3] or of a nature to create a technical qualification of the title conveyed by the deed.[4]

On the other hand, a bona fide purchaser without notice of a restrictive covenant not running with the land will not be enjoined from acting contrary to its terms.[5] However, constructive notice of a restrictive covenant is sufficient in equity to bind a purchaser to observe it, and hence such purchaser may be restrained from breaching the terms of a covenant contained in a deed to some of his predecessors in title even though remote, and even though such limitation is not contained in the deed to the purchaser himself.[6] Subsequent purchasers with notice of a covenant not running with the land will be enjoined only when the covenant restricts the use of the land.[7]

An injunction to restrain the breach of a restrictive covenant will not be granted against a trespasser or adverse possessor on land owned by plaintiff.[8]

(4) Considerations as to Issuance of Injunction

(a) In general
(b) Doubtful rights
(c) Amount of damage as material
(d) Conduct of complainant
(e) Relative convenience and injury to parties
(f) Change in character of neighborhood

(a) In General

The enforcement by injunction of covenants restricting the use of land is within the discretion of the court; they may be enforced although they may not run with the land or constitute easements.

To render restrictive covenants as to the use of land enforceable by injunction it is not necessary that they should run with the land[9] or that they should constitute easements.[10] It is no bar to an injunction that the restriction is no part of a scheme of general improvement if complainant is the possessor of the land for the benefit of which the restriction was made.[11] It is not material that a restrictive stipulation should be binding at law,[12] or that any privity of estate or of contract should subsist between the parties,[13] in order to render such stipulation obligatory and to warrant equitable relief in case of the infraction of it. The fact that no violation has actually been committed does not preclude the court from exercising its equity jurisdiction to relieve against a breach of a covenant; it is sufficient that a breach is intended.[14]

However, the enforcement by injunction of restrictive covenants as to the use of land is a matter of discretion with the court and not a matter of absolute right,[15] and is governed by the same general rules which control equitable relief by specific performance.[16] Such covenants will not be enforced by injunction where they are vague or uncertain,[17] or wanting in mutuality,[18] or contrary to public policy,[19] where there is no breach or threatened breach,[20] or the violation is unsubstantial,[21] or the restriction has expired by its own terms,[22] or where the enforcement would be inequitable,[23] although mere pecuniary loss to defendant will not prevent enforcement.[24] Where the restrictions are fixed, definite, and unambiguous, they should be enforced as written and should not be extended by judicial construction.[25] Where the restrictions definitely state what may and what may not be done with the property, the court will not imply additional restrictions to those fixed by the parties themselves.[26]

Where restrictions are omitted from the deed through accident or mistake, the remedy of the grantors is by bill to reform the deed, and cannot be considered under a bill to enforce restrictions.[27]

Provision for penalty or forfeiture. The violation of a restrictive covenant by a grantee may be enjoined even though there is no provision in the deed for the forfeiture of title to the grantor for breach of the restriction.[28] On the other hand, a covenant restricting the use of land may be enforced by injunction although it provides for a penalty in case of breach;[29] it is no objection to an injunction that forfeiture of the premises is fixed as a penalty for a breach or that a right of entry is reserved in case of a breach.[30]

Restriction must concern estate itself. A restriction as to the use of land, unless it is for the benefit of the land itself, must be considered as a purely personal covenant which will not be enforced by injunction against the grantees or successors in interest of the covenantor.[31]

Violation of restriction by other persons. The violation of a restrictive covenant by persons other than complainant, in which he has not acquiesced, will not in general debar him from the right to enjoin a violation by others,[32] unless there has been such a change in the neighborhood that the original purpose and design of the covenants have been broken up and the reason for enforcing them has ceased to exist.[33]

(b) Doubtful Rights

An injunction to restrict another in the uses to which he may put his land will not issue unless the right to restrict is made manifest and clear in the covenant.

Covenants which restrict another in the use to which he may put his lands are strictly construed, as considered in Deeds § 163, and, unless the right to restrict is made manifest and clear in the covenant, a court of equity will not aid by its process of injunction one owner to restrict another in the otherwise lawful use to which he may put his lands.[34]

(c) Amount of Damage as Material

A covenant restricting the use of land may be enforced by injunction without regard to the damages caused by the breach.

It is a well defined exception to a general rule stated supra § 22 that, where one who has entered into a restrictive covenant as to the use of land commits a distinct breach thereof, he may be enjoined irrespective of the amount of damage caused by his breach, and even if there appears to be no particular damage.[35] A court of equity fastens on the real contract and compels the execution of the very thing covenanted to be done.[36] It is not necessary to prove that the injury will be irreparable.[37]

It has even been held that the right to an injunction will in no way be affected by the fact that the act complained of or the removal of the restriction would be beneficial to complainant's property or enhance its value or the value of other properties in the restricted area;[38] but it has also been held that, where the purpose of the restriction has been frustrated and the result of enforcing it is to depreciate rather than to enhance the value of the property concerned, a court of equity should not interfere.[39]

Restriction against ownership by colored persons

Where common grantors sold six contiguous lots to different purchasers inserting in all deeds but one covenant restricting against negro ownership or occupation, but during the more than thirty years which had expired since execution of deeds, residential conditions had changed so that strict enforcement of all five covenants would not give advantages which the covenants sought to confer, and market value of property was greater for colored occupancy than for white occupancy, the court would not grant injunctive relief for violation of the covenant, but would leave the parties to such remedies as they might have at law.—Hundley v. Gorewitz, supra.

aa. In General

Injunctive relief against the breach of a covenant restricting the use of land will be denied where the plaintiff has himself materially breached the covenant.

A substantial violation by complainant of a covenant restricting the use of land bars any right to an injunction in his favor against others violating the same covenant;[40] and this rule is especially applicable where defendant has spent large sums of money on the premises in reliance on complainant's abandonment of the restriction,[41] or where the violation complained of will not be detrimental to complainant's interests.[42]

Nevertheless the fact that complainant has violated a restriction in the same manner as defendant will not bar him from invoking the jurisdiction of equity to restrain defendant from a further and different encroachment to his injury.[43] Unsubstantial violations by complainant of the covenant will not prevent him from maintaining an action for an injunction to prevent substantial violations thereof.[44]

bb. Laches, Acquiescence, Waiver, and Estoppel

Injunctive relief to restrain the breach of a covenant restricting the use of land may be barred by laches, waiver, or acquiescence of the plaintiff in the violation of the covenant.

The right to enforce by injunction a covenant restricting the use of land may be lost by laches,[45] waiver,[46] or by acquiescence in the violation of the covenant,[47] in which cases the person injured will be remitted to an action of damages.[48]

An important limitation to the general rule is recognized in many decisions to the effect that a person entitled to enforce a restrictive covenant may have notice of violations which inflict no substantial injury on him without losing the right to enforce the restriction in case of a substantially injurious violation by failure to take steps to restrain the first mentioned class of violations.[49]

Whether there has been laches, waiver, or acquiescence is a question of fact to be determined in each case.[50] To prevent a bar by reason of laches, seasonable notice or protest to defendant or other appropriate action is necessary.[51] Plaintiff is not guilty of laches where he acts with reasonable promptness after he receives knowledge of the violation,[52] especially where defendant knowingly violated the restriction.[53] Plaintiff is not chargeable with laches where steps were taken to enforce the restriction immediately on discovery of its violation,[54] or where on the attempted violation protest was made and a bill filed as quickly as could be done,[55] or as soon as the protest was shown to be unavailing.[56] There are some decisions which hold that protest alone is insufficient to avoid the imputation of laches, and that legal proceedings should be instituted at the earliest practicable moment after knowledge of the proposed violation and before any serious expenditure of money has been made,[57] but it has also been held that, if defendant has received notice or protest against proposed violations of restrictive covenants, as soon as the violations are commenced or as soon as they are discovered, no laches is attributable to complainant such as will bar his right to a mandatory injunction to compel the restoration of the property to its original condition, although he does not bring suit immediately after protest or indeed until after the completion of the acts constituting a violation of the covenant,[58] as under these circumstances defendant must be considered to have acted at his peril,[59] and the right of complainant to an injunction is not affected by the fact that he delayed suit until an injunction would cause more damage to defendant than its refusal would cause to complainant.[60] In any event the right to relief by injunction is not lost by laches or estoppel where defendant is not injured by reason of the failure of complainant to take earlier proceedings for the enforcement of his rights.[61] The delay of complainant in protesting a violation of the covenant and in instituting suit does not bar injunctive relief where the delay was caused by defendant.[62]

Further violations. The fact that the right to injunctive relief against violation of a restrictive covenant has been lost by laches or acquiescence in no way affects the right to enjoin further violations of the covenant.[63]

Waiver by other interested persons. The court may take into consideration the fact that all the interested persons, or most of them, are willing to waive the enforcement of the covenant when injunctive relief to restrain its violation is sought by one of their number.[64]

(e) Relative Convenience and Injury to Parties

On an application to restrain the violation of a covenant restricting the use of land, the court ordinarily will not consider the relative inconvenience and injury to the parties.

On an application for an injunction to restrain the breach of a restrictive covenant as to the use of land, the court ordinarily will not take into consideration the relative inconvenience and injury to the parties,[65] and especially is this true where defendant had knowingly and deliberately violated the restrictive covenant.[66] Nevertheless, it has been held that, in case complainant's right is doubtful, a court of equity will give consideration to the inconvenience and damage that would result to defendant in determining whether an injunction should issue, and where great inconvenience and damage would result to defendant with little or no corresponding benefit to complainant, the remedy by injunction is properly denied.[67]

(f) Change in Character of Neighborhood

Injunctive relief to restrain the violation of a covenant restricting the use of land will be denied where there has been such a change in the character of the neighborhood since the making of the covenant as to defeat the purpose of the restrictions and to render their enforcement inequitable and burdensome.

Where covenants restricting the use of real property were made with reference to the continuance of existing general conditions of the property and its surroundings and there has been such a change in the character of the neighborhood as to defeat the purpose of the restrictions and to render their enforcement inequitable and burdensome, a court of equity will not enforce these restrictions by injunction but will leave complainant to his remedy at law.[68] Especially should an injunction be denied where this change is due to the acts of the grantor who imposed the restriction or of those who derive title under him,[69] or where it appears that complainant would be benefited rather than injured by the erection and violation complained of and where the granting of an injunction would bear very heavily on defendant.[70] Nevertheless to render this limitation of the general rule operative, it must appear that there has been a radical change in the environment and character of the neighborhood in which the property is situated,[71] and, where the change does not conflict with the essential purpose

Whether equity should refuse to restrain the violation of restrictive covenants on the use of land, imposed by the common owner thereof in deeds conveying lots plotted by the common owner, on account of changed conditions affecting the premises to which covenants relate, rests in the discretion of the court and depends largely on the facts of the particular case, and mainly on whether the enforcement of covenants would greatly harm the defendant without any substantial benefit to plaintiff so as to make enforcement inequitable.—Purdy v. Mulroney, 31 N.Y.S.2d 1006.

(5) Building Restrictions

The violation of a building restriction may in a proper case be enjoined.

Building restrictions, such as those which prohibit the erection of buildings on the land, or which prescribe the character of buildings which may be erected, may be enforced by injunction, where they are not unreasonable and not contrary to public policy,[75] as long as the restrictions are of substantial value to the persons intended to be benefited.[76] Such restrictions may be enforced by injunction against one acquiring the property with notice of the restriction.[77] They may be enforced without proof of actual or substantial injury;[78] it is not an objection to the allowance of an injunction that the inconvenience to complainant caused by the breach of the covenant is slight,[79] or even that he would be benefited by the breach as he is entitled to stand on his legal rights.[80] Relief against a breach of the covenant may be decreed although the acts of defendant are permitted under a zoning

Agreement not to attach building to plaintiff's wall

Plaintiff owning building with wall extending into defendant's property was entitled to enjoin defendant from violating oral agreement of parties' predecessors by attaching new building to wall, where wall was erected and windows constructed therein on faith of contract.—McBride Realty Co. v. Grace, 15 S.W.2d 957, 223 Mo.App. 508.

Agreement not to violate or question building zone ordinance

Equity will not permit one who is a party to a private contract not to violate or question the validity of a building zone ordinance to violate its covenants, regardless of pecuniary gain or loss.—Kelley v. Levitt & Sons, 28 N.Y.S.2d 175, 262 App.Div. 92, reargument denied 29 N.Y.S.2d 726, 262 App.Div. 891.

ordinance.[81] The suit may be instituted as soon as a breach of the covenant is threatened without awaiting an actual breach.[82]

However, not every violation of a building restriction will entitle plaintiff to injunctive relief.[83] The granting or refusal of relief is a matter of discretion with the court and not a matter of absolute right,[84] and is to be governed by equitable considerations.[85] Each case must depend on its peculiar circumstances.[86] Injunctive relief will be denied where there is no breach or threatened breach of the building restriction,[87] or the violation is unsubstantial,[88] or the right to relief is doubtful,[89] or the restriction has expired,[90] where enforcement will involve inequitable consequences and great hardship to defendant,[91] where complainant has substantially violated the restrictions[92] or has been guilty of laches, waiver, or acquiescence,[93]

or where defendant is without notice of a building restriction not running with the land.[94] Where a proposed building is strictly within the letter of the requirements of the restrictive covenants, its erection will not be enjoined, although it would be detrimental to the interests of the neighborhood,[95] and injunctive relief may be denied where the building does not violate the spirit of the covenant although it violates the letter.[96]

Kind of building. An injunction may issue to restrain the breach of an agreement not to put up a building other than one to be used as a dwelling or for residential purposes,[97] or not to put up a

Notifying defendant before work commenced

Where owner of realty in addition restricted by plat mainly to residences, obtained a permit about September 10 to build a gasoline service station, and prior to commencement of any work on the premises actions were brought against the owner by certain residents of the subdivision, other residents of the subdivision who commenced another action to enjoin the erection of the station on October 11 were not guilty of "laches."—Williamson v. Needles, 133 P.2d 211, 191 Okl. 560.

Five months after protest

Although mere assertion by written notice of rights of neighboring landowners to prevent contemplated violation of building restriction on all land in the section did not relieve landowners from bringing legal action to establish such rights, a delay of five months did not necessarily constitute "laches" that would bar an action to enforce restriction, the test being whether landowners were guilty of any omission that would warrant presumption that they had abandoned the claim of a violation.—Pehlert v. Neff, 31 A.2d 446, 152 Pa.Super. 84.

Misrepresentation as to violation

Under restrictions excluding bungalows generally, but permitting them in a certain portion of the tract bounded by a line one hundred feet from M street, where plaintiff may not have known that defendants' bungalows were within one hundred feet of such street, and was assured by defendants' representative that they did not violate the restriction, injunctive relief will not be denied because the bungalows have been completed.—Pellegrino v. MacKenzie St. Const. Corporation, 197 N.Y.S. 699, 120 Misc. 89, affirmed 200 N.Y.S. 939, 206 App.Div. 709.

Purchaser of lot obtaining waiver of building restrictions from corporation former owner, which had reserved right to waive restriction, after corporation on dissolution had conveyed property to another, cannot be enjoined from violating building restrictions, where conveyance by corporation was for purpose of settling its affairs, and it did not appear that corporation, by conveying remaining lots, had transferred right to waive restrictions, in view of Or. Sufficiency of notice

Vendor's representations to two purchasers that there were building restrictions on entire subdivision did not put other purchasers on inquiry.—Zwickey v. Sullivan, 211 N. W. 746, 237 Mich. 333.

Where purchaser's deed does not contain restrictions, it must clearly appear that there was such general plan of uniform restriction on all lots in the allotment, that deeds for the lots uniformly contain such restrictions, and that purchaser had knowledge of such general plan and uniform restriction at time he purchased his lot.—Davidson v. Buckeye Homes, 11 Ohio Supp. 54.

Two buildings on single lot in violation of covenant

Where a restriction was placed in deeds conveying lots in subdivision limiting one private dwelling house to a lot, and, because of a splitting of lots, only eleven houses were maintained on twelve lots, the dividing of lots so that portions of two separate buildings were maintained on single lots violated letter but not spirit of restriction, and injunction will be refused against a lot owner who sought to build a second dwelling on a subdivision of his lot.—Hoffman v. Schwan, supra.

Camp for underprivileged children

Erection of billboard in violation of covenant allowing improvements only for "residential purposes" will be enjoined.—Greer v. Bornstein, 54 S.W.2d 927, 246 Ky. 286.

Where a deed contained a stipulation that land conveyed was to be used only for residence purposes, with a clause that the title should be forfeited on violation of the conditions of the stipulation, a subsequent purchaser can be enjoined from excavating the lot to a depth of ten feet, and lessening the value of property in the vicinity.—Smith v. K. M. Van Zandt Land Co., Tex.Civ.App., 246 S.W. 683.

Use of property as cat and dog hospital would be restrained, where deed restricted use of property for residential purposes, except that physicians or dentists could maintain office in residence.—Palfrey v. Killian, 27 S.W.2d 462, 224 Mo.App. 325.

Operation of boarding house or tourist home

(1) Holders, under deed contain-dwelling on the premises,[98] not to erect a building for commercial purposes,[99] or not to build a tenement house,[1] a flat,[2] a frame building,[3] or a building composed of any but specified materials,[4] or not to erect a building above a certain height on the premises,[5] or not to put up a building costing less than a specified amount;[6] and it has been held that the fact that the building put up in violation of the restriction is portable, and that the violation of the restriction might be only temporary, does not prevent the issuance of an injunction to restrain the violation.[7] An injunction against the erection of a particular kind of building will be refused where the lot is not included in the area covered by the restrictive covenants.[8]

Location of building. An injunction may be granted to restrain the breach of a contract fixing the limits within which buildings may be erected,[9] as in the case of a contract not to put up a building within a certain number of feet from a street or boundary line.[10] The breach of a covenant not ing building restriction requiring private dwelling, will be restrained from operating boarding house.—Schreiber v. Drosness, 136 A. 515, 100 N.J.Eq. 591, affirmed Schreiber v. Drossness, 135 A. 920, 100 N.J.Eq. 591.

(2) Trial court did not abuse its discretion in granting injunction to property owners in subdivision enjoining one of the owners from violating restrictive covenants forbidding construction or maintenance on the premises of any building except one one-family dwelling house by operating his house as a rooming house, notwithstanding that covenant had only about a year and a half to run when suit was brought.—Hooker v. Alexander, 29 A.2d 308, 129 Conn. 433.

(3) Where land was developed under general scheme and on much of the developed land restrictive covenants were imposed requiring that land should be used only for residential purposes, one who bought home with intention of using it for tourist home and so used it, with constructive knowledge of covenants restricting use to residential purposes, and actual knowledge from abstract of title, was properly enjoined from using home as tourist home.—Deitrick v. Leadbetter, 8 S.E.2d 276, 175 Va. 170, 127 A.L.R. 849.

Operation of restaurant within subdivision, which was located near plaintiff's residence and in which fighting and noisemaking occurred late at night, disturbing plaintiff's sleep, was enjoined as violating restriction.—Smith v. Nickuloff, 277 N. W. 880, 283 Mich. 188.

That defendant was occupying garage as residence in violation of building restriction only pending construction of permanent residence was no defense to injunction against violation.—Plaster v. Stutsman, Tex. Civ.App., 8 S.W.2d 750.

Public inconvenience in requiring consumers of gasoline to go one thousand and nine hundred feet further did not prevent enforcement of covenant restricting use of property for residential purposes.—Ludgate v. Somerville, 256 P. 1043, 121 Or. 643, 54 A.L.R. 837.

99. Boarding house

The facts that city lot is located in zoned district, provided by municipal ordinance regulating keeping of boarders, and that owner has applied for license to carry on such business in her dwelling house thereon, are immaterial in suit to enjoin use of such house for that purpose in violation of covenant in deed conveying lot to defendant that she would not use any building thereon for commercial purpose.—David v. Temporary use of garage house as residence

Property owners in tract which was subdivided under trust agreement containing building restriction requiring any dwelling to cost not less than six thousand dollars were not entitled to enjoin construction of "garage-house" to be used for temporary residence of lot owners who contemplated building a house in conformance with building restriction, where similar "garage-houses" had been previously constructed, and property owners showed no monetary damage.—Gillingham v. Porch extending beyond limit

(1) Where restriction in deed prohibited erection of building within thirty feet from street line, a dwelling house, the foundation of which extended back thirty feet from street, but the porch of which as part of building extended forward several feet, from foundation, violated the restriction and would be restrained at grantor's suit.—Clough v. Mesnick, 126 A. 740, 96 N.J.Eq. 482, affirmed 130 A. 917, 98 N.J.Eq. 706.

(2) Porch projecting nine feet beyond building line, created by a covenant, so as to obstruct the light and air of plaintiff, adjoining lot owner, and spoil uniformity of building line, was an encroachment damaging to erect buildings so as to obstruct a view,[11] or the passage of light and air,[12] may be enjoined.

Change in use of buildings. A change in the use of buildings in respect of which it has been agreed that they shall not extend or project beyond a designated line does not affect the right to enjoin a breach of the covenant since the importance of the maintenance of a building line may be as great when buildings are used for purposes of business as when they are occupied only as dwellings.[13]

Change in character of neighborhood. Injunctive relief to restrain the violation of building restrictions will be denied where there has been a change in the character of the neighborhood which would render enforcement of the restrictions inequitable and burdensome.[14] To justify the denial of injunctive relief, it must appear that there has been a radical change in the environment and character of the neighborhood.[15] As long as the restriction is of substantial value to the dominant owner its violation will be restrained.[16] The fact that the current of business has reached the restricted territory does not of itself afford ground for denying equitable relief where the encroachments of business have not made the property undesirable for private residences.[17] Those owning property in a restricted residential district or neighborhood, and especially those who have their homes there and have been led to buy or build in such locality by reason of restrictive covenants running with the land imposed on the street, block, or subdivision in which they have purchased, are entitled to protection against prohibited invasion regardless of how close business may crowd around them on unrestricted property, provided the original plan for a residential district has not been departed from in the restricted district, street, or block, and the restrictive requirements have been generally enforced, or accepted and complied with by purchasers.[18]

General disregard of restrictions. Where building restrictions have been disregarded and practically abandoned by substantially all of those owning land within the building scheme or plan, and the enforcement of the restriction against defendant would not be effectual to put the general building plan in the condition contemplated by the restrictions, equity will not enjoin a violation thereof.[19] Especially is the rule applicable where the plaintiff which he was entitled to enjoin.—Mueller v. Schier, 205 N.W. 912, 189 Wis. 70.

Where violation is unsubstantial, injunctive relief will be denied, especially where plaintiff has also violated the restriction.—Foster v. Bunting, Tex.Civ.App., 19 S.W.2d 784.

infraction complained of does not diminish the value of the other estates,[20] where an enforcement of compliance with the restrictions against defendant will be attended with great loss to him,[21] or where a large part of the time during which the restriction should be operative has already expired.[22]

Nevertheless in order to bar the right to enjoin a breach of a building restriction on the ground of general disregard of the restriction by others in the restricted district, it is essential that the departure from the restrictions should be of a substantial character.[23] A few sporadic instances of violation of the restrictions, which violations have not been attacked, do not establish evidence of an abandonment of the general plan.[24] That there have been some deviation from the restrictions is not alone ground for refusing to enforce them to the extent that they remain beneficial,[25] especially where the deviation is in another part of the subdivision.[26]

(6) Restrictions as to Kinds of Business

An injunction may issue to restrain the breach of a covenant not to engage in a certain business on the premises.

Where defendant has agreed not to carry on certain classes of business on the premises, he will be enjoined from breaking his contract.[27] No showing of actual,[28] or substantial damage,[29] or irreparable injury,[30] is essential to authorize the issuance of an injunction, and the fact that forfeiture is prescribed by the contract as a penalty for its breach is no objection to the granting of an injunction.[31] The fact that the use prohibited by the covenant is not a private or public nuisance does not affect the right to an injunction against a breach of the covenant.[32]

On the other hand, injunctive relief will be denied where the covenant is lacking in mutuality[33] or is unreasonable,[34] or where there has been such change in the general neighborhood since the property was bought by defendant as would make enforcement inequitable,[35] or where plaintiff has been guilty of laches.[36]

Application of rules. The above rules have been applied where the premises were used contrary to a restrictive covenant as a blacksmith shop,[37] a Chinese laundry,[38] a distillery for resin oil,[39] a grocery,[40] a livery stable,[41] a public eating house,[42] a public garage,[43] or a saloon or place for the sale of intoxicating liquors.[44] The maintenance of a hospital for the open air treatment of consumptives has been held a violation of a restriction in the use of the premises prohibiting their use in any "business causing offensive smells or injuriously affecting the health or condition of the neighborhood," which will be enjoined.[45]

(7) Mandatory Injunction

A mandatory injunction may be issued directing the removal or alteration of a building or structure erected in violation of a restrictive covenant.

Unless prohibited by statute,[46] in a proper case the court by means of a mandatory injunction may compel the undoing of a thing already done in violation of a restrictive agreement affecting real estate.[47]

When buildings or structures have been erected in breach of a restrictive covenant, their removal or alteration may be ordered,[48] especially where the structure has been erected with full knowledge of the restriction and in willful violation of plaintiff's rights.[49] The court will not ordinarily take into consideration the relative amount of inconvenience or injury to be suffered by the parties in case the injunction is granted or refused, except in cases where the damage caused by the breach is minute.[50] However, the breach of the restrictive covenant does not entitle plaintiff to a mandatory injunction directing the removal of a building or structure as a matter of right.[51] Whether such an injunction shall issue depends on all the equities between the parties.[52] The breach must be very clear to justify a mandatory injunction,[53] and it is essential that the common scheme of building should have been actually preserved.[54] A mandatory injunction may be denied when it will operate inequitably and oppressively,[55] or where there has been nothing more than a mere breach of a negative legal right which licensees in order to test enforceability of restriction, and thereafter sought injunction against other licensees, restriction was enforceable and residents were not guilty of laches, although two or three years had elapsed since licenses were issued.—Benner v. Tacony Athletic Ass'n, supra.

is not injurious or detrimental in any way to plaintiff's rights,[56] or where the injury complained of is not serious or substantial and may be readily compensated in damages, while to restore things as they were before the acts complained of would subject defendant to great inconvenience and loss,[57] especially where defendant has acted in good faith.[58] The application must be promptly made[59] and relief will be denied where plaintiff has been guilty of laches or has waived or acquiesced in the violation.[60] The limited duration of the covenant, in connection with other circumstances, is a circumstance adverse to its enforcement by mandatory injunction.[61] Where a lot was purchased and a building erected before a building line is established and without notice of an intention to establish such a line, equity will not compel the removal of the building, even though subsequent to the erection a deed is accepted containing the restriction.[62]

Pendente lite. A mandatory injunction directing the removal of a structure erected in violation of a building covenant will never be granted pendente lite.[63]

§ 88. Other Contracts

An injunction may issue to restrain the breach of various contracts, such as a contract not to contest a will or a patent, not to contract with others for the manufacture of goods, etc.

In addition to the numerous classes of contracts considered supra §§ 81–87, a breach or threatened breach of various other contracts may, in a proper case, be enjoined,[64] such as a contract not to contest a will[65] or to infringe or contest the validity of patents;[66] not to engage in the insurance business except for plaintiff corporation;[67] or not to erect poles on a right of way.[68]

In addition, an injunction may issue to enjoin the violation of a contract not to invade the territory of the vendee for the sale of articles;[69] not to make changes in a play or additions thereto without plaintiff's consent;[70] not to make machines of the same pattern as that used in making machines for complainant for persons in competition with complainant;[71] not to manufacture and sell a patented article;[72] not to contract with others for the manufacture of goods;[73] not to sell goods other than those furnished by complainant to defendant in competition with plaintiff's goods;[74] or not to molest or annoy.[75] By force of statutory provision a sale of standing timber may carry such an interest in real estate that a breach of a contract therefor may be enjoined.[76]

§ 89. Inducing Breach of Contract

a. In general
b. Particular contracts

a. In General

An injunction ordinarily may issue to restrain a third person from unlawfully inducing the breach of a lawful contract by one of the parties thereto when it will result in irreparable injury to the other.

In the absence of statutes limiting or prohibiting injunctive relief, an injunction will lie to restrain third persons singly or in combination from unlawfully inducing the breach of a lawful contract by one of the parties thereto when it will result in irreparable injury to the other,[77] irrespective of the fact that defendant is solvent;[78] nor is it essential that the contract should be of such a nature that specific performance could be decreed.[79]

On the other hand, the mere interference with a lawful contract by a stranger thereto does not of itself give the injured person a remedy by injunction.[80] Injunctive relief will be denied where there is legal justification for interference,[81] where full indemnity may be had at law,[82] or where the contract is indefinite, uncertain, or incomplete,[83] or is prohibited by statute, is contrary to public policy, is in restraint of trade, or monopolistic in its tendency or result.[84]

Contract terminable at will. The fact that the contract is "at will" and terminable by either party at any time is of no consequence,[85] where neither party had attempted to revoke the contract and was not obliged to do so,[86] since each party to the con-

Physician was not entitled to enjoin threatened disciplinary proceedings against him by state medical board for allegedly unprofessional conduct in contracting with fraternal society to serve its members on ground that such proceedings would interfere with the contractual relationship, since the statute providing for a hearing before the board and a review of its orders afforded an adequate remedy at law.—Fisch v. tract has a manifest interest in the freedom of the other to exercise his judgment without illegal interference or compulsion.[87]

Expiration of term of contract. The right to an injunction is not affected by the fact that the term of the contract had expired before the final order was made where it did not affirmatively appear that there had been a full compliance with its provisions and where the bill had been taken as confessed before the contract expired.[88]

Means employed. The rule restraining a third person from inducing the breach of a contract applies where the means employed to induce the breach consist in persuasion,[89] false or fraudulent representations,[90] coercion,[91] threats,[92] intimidation,[93] or violence.[94]

b. Particular Contracts

In a proper case an injunction may issue to restrain a third person from inducing the breach of an employment contract or a contract conferring an exclusive privilege, and a third person may be restrained from inducing one's customers to break their contracts.

The rule, discussed supra subdivision a of this section, that an injunction may issue to restrain a third person from unlawfully inducing a breach of contract has been applied to various types of contracts,[95] such as a contract conferring an exclusive agency or privilege.[96] The rule has also been applied in the case of service contracts;[97] and the fact that the contract is terminable at the will of either employer or employee does not affect the right to an injunction.[98]

Customers' contracts. Injunctions have been granted in many cases to prevent third persons from inducing one's customers to break their contracts with him,[99] without proof of express malice,[1] and that, too, although the contract was revocable at will, where neither party had revoked the contract and was not obliged so to do.[2] Relief will be denied where the remedy at law is adequate.[3]

§ 90. Restraining Execution of Contract

An injunction ordinarily will not be granted to restrain the performance of a contract.

It is seldom that a party to a contract will be prevented by injunction from carrying it out, since complainant's remedy at law ordinarily is adequate,[4] and especially should an injunction be denied where the execution of the contract will result in actual benefit to the party asking the injunction and where an injunction would cause defendant great loss.[5] The equitable powers of the court cannot be invoked for the purpose of restraining enforcement of a contract, unless there be some facts justifying such relief of which a court of equity could, and a court of law could not, take cognizance.[6]

However, it has been held that, where a contract is void as against public policy, a court of equity may at the suit of one of the parties enjoin the other party from carrying it out.[7] It has also been held that the enforcement of a contract which is illegal by reason of the fact that one of the parties was a foreign corporation which had not complied with the domestic laws may be enjoined at the suit of the other party who had repented in time,[8] that a court of equity will interpose by injunction to prevent the several members of an illegal combination from enforcing an agreement to the injury of one engaged in a competing business,[9] and that, where parties make a contract conditioned on the organization of a corporation, and the corporation is not formed, an injunction should be granted to one party to restrain the other from contracting under a corporate name or acting with the property mentioned in the contract as partnership property.[10] The performance of a void contract of a municipality may be enjoined at the suit of a taxpayer.[11]

Pending suit for rescission, cancellation, or reformation. Pending a suit for the rescission, cancellation, or reformation of a contract, the court may grant a temporary injunction restraining defendant from exercising rights under the contract in fraud of complainant.[12]

Effect of injunction. The court cannot completely destroy a valid contract by granting a temporary injunction against its performance; it can thereby only delay its consummation.[13]

§ 91. Restraining Forfeiture of Contract

An injunction may issue to restrain the forfeiture of a contract.

Injunction will lie to prevent a party from enforcing the forfeiture of a contract by means manifestly never intended and such as are clearly oppressive.[14] However, where the circumstances warrant, injunctive relief against a forfeiture will be denied.[15]

Execution of contract in restraint of trade will not be enjoined at the instance of a third party injured thereby, since such ground is merely a defense when the contract is sought to be enforced against a party thereto.—Tanenbaum v. New York F. Ins. Exch., 68 N.Y.S. 342, 33 Misc. 134.

Restraining performance of prior assignment

Assignees of oil and gas lease previously assigned by one defendant to codefendants under escrow agreement, were not entitled to restrain codefendants as prior assignees from carrying out first assignment, in absence of a showing that prior assignment was unenforceable, plaintiff's remedy being confined to recovery for damages for breach of contract.—Chaffin v. Harpham, 266 S.W. 685, 166 Ark. 578.

Necessity of reformation to correct mistake in contract

Equity will not enjoin the enforcement of an unambiguous contract on the ground that by mistake of the scrivener it was not made to express the real agreement between the parties, without first reforming the instrument under appropriate proceedings.—McRae v. Smith, 137 S.E. 390, 164 Ga. 23—32 C.J. p 227 note 82 [a] (2).

Circumstances excusing delay in performance barring injunction

Owner of dramatic rights in play was not entitled to restrain producer from asserting rights under contract to produce play where the producer's failure to produce the play within the time specified was due to injuries suffered by the leading character.—Hopkins v. § 92. Restraining Person from Incapacitating Himself, or Preventing Others, from Performing Contract

An injunction may issue to restrain a party to a contract from doing acts which will prevent him from performing his contract or which prevent the plaintiff from performing his part of the contract.

A party to a contract may be enjoined from doing acts that will prevent him from performing his contract,[16] and from doing acts that will prevent complainant from performing his part of the contract.[17]

§ 93. Mandatory Injunction

A mandatory injunction may issue to prevent irreparable injury where property or privileges have been taken away in violation of a contract.

The court has power to prevent irreparable injury by issuing mandatory injunctions, where property or privileges have been taken away in violation of a contract.[18] A mandatory injunction to perform a contract is a drastic remedy[19] and will be sparingly granted.[20] A mandatory injunction will be denied where there is no breach or threatened breach of the contract,[21] or the contract is vague or uncertain,[22] or there is an adequate remedy at law.[23]

§ 94. Person Entitled to Injunction

An injunction to restrain a breach of contract may be granted at the suit of assignees or grantees when the contract right is transferrable and inures to their benefit.

Although the person asking an injunction to restrain a breach of contract must usually be a party to the contract itself,[25] yet assignees and grantees may also obtain an injunction to prevent the breach of contract, when the contract right was intended to be thus transferable and to inure to their benefit.[26] An assignor who has sufficient interest may sue to restrain a breach of the contract.[27]

In a suit to restrain the breach of a covenant not to engage in a competing business, whether a person not named as plaintiff is the real party in interest is a question of fact, to be determined as such.[28]

§ 95. Who May Be Restrained

Injunctive relief to restrain a breach of contract ordinarily will not be granted against a person who is not a party to the contract.

An injunction to restrain the breach of a contract ordinarily will not be issued against a person who is not a party to the contract.[29] However, it is not indispensable to the issuance of an injunction against a breach of contract that the party against whom the injunction is sought should himself have been a party to the contract.[30] Thus an injunction may be issued against one who stands in the place of a party to the contract for a breach thereof, if the conditions necessary to the allowance of an injunction against the original party to the contract are present.[31] Third persons may be enjoined from assisting a party to a contract to commit a breach thereof.[32]

D. CORPORATE FRANCHISES, MANAGEMENT AND DEALINGS

As resorted to against a corporation, quo warranto and injunction are inconsistent remedies.

Under varying circumstances injunction is a proper remedy to protect corporate franchises as discussed infra § 97, to compel corporate action as discussed generally infra § 101, or to prevent unauthorized or wrongful acts of a corporation or of corporate officers as discussed infra §§ 99, 102–107.

Quo warranto distinguished. When employed against a corporation, the remedies of quo warranto and injunction are wholly inconsistent; quo warranto goes to the life of the corporation informed against while a proceeding to enjoin is necessarily predicated on an anticipation of the continuance of defendant's corporate existence.[33]

§ 97. Protection of Corporate Rights and Franchises

Subject to the usual limitations on the right to an injunction, injunction is a proper remedy to prevent wrongful invasion of a franchise or right of a corporation.

being invaded.[34] This right to protection extends, not only to actual, but also to threatened interference with the rights conferred by the franchise.[35] An injunction is proper whether the invasion complained of is by another corporation or person,[36] or by the public or a political subdivision of the state,[37] and whether the invasion seeks to destroy the franchise or merely to participate in the privileges of complainant corporation.[38]

While a corporation whose franchise is not exclusive is not entitled to enjoin legitimate competition by another person or corporation operating under a similar franchise or right in the same territory,[39] a corporation whose franchise is prior in point of time may be entitled to protection against another corporation acting under a like authority in such a manner as is likely to injure the property of plaintiff or endanger its employees;[40] and, even though complainant's franchise is not exclusive, equity may, according to some authorities, enjoin the illegal acts of others who assume to exercise a like privilege where complainant's franchise is operative, in the absence of authority and in defiance of laws regulating the privilege,[41] but according to some cases the corporate holder of a franchise which is not exclusive is not entitled to an injunction against a competitor solely on the ground that such competitor is not legally constituted as a corporation[42] or is not authorized by law to conduct the operation in question.[43]

The illegal interferenee may be enjoined, even though it is accompanied by, or consists of, acts of personal trespass,[44] or even arrests and criminal prosecutions,[45] and regardless of the fact that the acts complained of constitute a misdemeanor.[46]

Where there is no interference with complainant's rights other than a claim of the exclusive franchise on the part of defendant, a court of equity will not interfere;[47] and this is also the case where the interference causes but slight, if any, inconvenience to complainant and public convenience is being served by defendant,[48] or, in some cases, where the acts complained of are not inconsistent, or do not interfere, with complainant's operations.[49] Under some circumstances, where a remedy is provided by statute for an invasion of complainant corporation's rights, equity will not intervene by granting an injunction,[50] but, according to some cases, the fact that a statute provides for a suit by the attorney general for an injunction does not prevent a suit by the injured corporation for an injunction,[51] and the fact that a statute provides for resort to a state administrative body for relief does not prevent such a suit by the corporation where the relief which such body might give would be inadequate.[52]

The invasion of a corporate right or franchise will be enjoined only when the existence of such right or franchise is clear[53] or has been established at law,[54] and an injunction against interference with an alleged right will not, of course, be granted where there is no such right.[55] As a general rule a preliminary injunction should not be granted unless a reasonably clear case of necessity and threatened irreparable damage is made out.[56]

Preliminary injunction

Where a telegraph company, after terminating the arrangement under which it maintained lines on a railroad right of way, was denied right of condemnation in Alabama, the propriety of the continuance in full force of a preliminary injunction against the railroad company's interference with the line of the telegraph company in Alabama pending determination of condemnation proceedings in that state was not established by the facts that the federal government had assumed control of the railroad and that there was a public necessity for the operation of the telegraph system as a whole; in the case at bar it appeared that the railroad company had promised to comply with the request of the secretary of war that such company should not interfere with the operation of the telegraph system until the secretary of war gave his approval, and it was held that the preliminary injunction should be dissolved with the proviso that the railroad company should not interfere with existing telegraph lines or their use by the telegraph company until the secretary of war consented thereto or until after thirty days' notice to him and lack of objection by him.—Louisville & N. § 98. Exercise of Powers and Management of Business

As a broad general rule, in the absence of fraud or breach of trust, injunction will not be granted to restrain a corporation in the exercise of its powers, nor will persons in control of a corporation be prevented from exercising powers duly vested in them.

It has been stated broadly that a court of equity has no peculiar jurisdiction to restrain a corporation in the exercise of its powers or to control its actions, in the absence of a showing of fraud or breach of trust.[57] In general persons in control of a corporation may not be prevented, by injunction, from exercising powers vested in such persons by the by-laws of the corporation,[58] and it has been held that an injunction may not be granted to prevent interference, pending a proceeding by mandamus, with the enjoyment of the privileges of membership in a corporation by one who has been expelled from membership.[59] It has been held, however, that, in a derivative action in the right of the corporation by members of the corporation to recover damages and for an accounting and other relief, an injunction pendente lite to restrain trial of charges against plaintiff members before the corporation's council of discipline which is controlled by defendants may be granted.[60]

A corporation whose business is not affected with a public interest may not be enjoined from refusing to deal with, or from discriminating, as to charges for services, against, a person with whom such corporation does not have a contractual relation.[61]

The right to injunction involving officers of a corporation in cases involving control and management is discussed in various aspects infra §§ 102–107.

§ 99. —— Exceeding or Misuse of Powers

Acts or threatened acts of a corporation in excess of its corporate powers or misuse of a franchise held by it may be prevented by injunction under some circumstances.

Where a corporation is acting or threatening to act in excess of its corporate powers,[62] or is misusing a franchise which it possesses,[63] to the injury of others, an injunction to restrain such acts may be a proper remedy, and the fact that the acts also constitute a crime is immaterial.[64] It has been stated broadly, however, that a court of equity has no peculiar jurisdiction to prevent corporations from violating their charters, in the absence of a showing of fraud or breach of trust.[65]

Injunction may be obtained by public or political entities or by public officers in cases in which the requisite public rights or interests are involved,[66]

Statutory authorization
(1) In view of Code 1932 § 9351, the state could maintain a suit to enjoin a corporation from doing a particular thing in violation of its charter; in this connection it was held that the substance of Acts 1845–1846 c 55 authorizing suit for injunction was incorporated into the code. —State ex rel. v. Southern Junior College, 64 S.W.2d 9, 166 Tenn. 535.
(2) Where a corporation organized under Code of District of Columbia § 599, was granting degrees, although not empowered to do so, under § 793 of such code the district attorney, in the name of the United States, could maintain a suit to restrain this usurpation of power.—National Ass'n of Certified Public Accountants v. U. S., 292 F. 668, 53 App.D.C. 391.
(3) Under Pub.Serv.L. § 103, public service commission could maintain proceeding to enjoin telephone company from furnishing service to hotels which failed to comply with tariff schedule filed pursuant to order of the commission fixing rates which hotels might charge their guests for telephone service.—People ex rel. Public Service Commission of New York (State Division, Department of Public Service) v. New York Telephone Co., 21 N.Y.S.2d 405, 174 Misc. 517.
(4) Where corporation by acting as a master plumber without being registered as such, was transacting an unauthorized business, such corporation was enjoined from carrying on the business of master plumber in a suit by the attorney general at the relation of the commissioner of corporations, pursuant to the statute, now Gen.L.Ter.Ed. c 155 § 11, providing that, on information in equity by the attorney general at the relation of the commissioner of

and in such cases it has generally been held that an injunction will issue, even though no affirmative showing is made of any special or definite injury,[67] although there is authority apparently to the contrary with respect to the right of a municipality to an injunction to restrain the misuse of a franchise.[68]

An injunction may be obtained by another corporation or an individual when special injury from the acts of the corporation is shown,[69] but, in general, not otherwise.[70] In a suit by a private individual brought under some statutes specifically authorizing such a suit, it is not necessary to show any special injury to, or special interest of, plaintiff, apart from that of other citizens.[71]

If complainant's remedy at law is adequate, he is not entitled to an injunction.[72] In any event, an injunction should be refused where the right thereto is doubtful[73] or where the acts complained of are in the nature of a public enterprise and improvement for the welfare of the public, and there is no showing of irreparable injury or serious damages from such acts.[74] So an individual cannot enjoin a corporation from exercising its legitimate corporate powers, on the ground that it has acquired a portion of its property illegally.[75]

Notwithstanding a statute provides that the court shall restrain by injunction injurious acts of a corporation if it does not have the right or franchise to do such acts, an injunction will not be granted unless a proper case is made out in accordance with the principles of equity practice;[76] and an injunction may properly be refused where complainant has delayed for a considerable period in bringing the case to a hearing, conditions have so changed pending suit that an injunction would cause great loss to defendant and inconvenience to the public, and the small injury to complainant is compensable in money.[77] A statutory provision authorizing the court to restrain a corporation from exercising any franchise or privilege or transacting any business not authorized by its charter or the laws of the state does not confer authority to enjoin a corporation from acting under a license, regularly but mistakenly granted, where the board granting it was clothed by law with jurisdiction in the premises.[78] The propriety of an injunction to prevent the practice of law by a corporation is discussed infra § 123, and of an injunction to prevent the practice of medicine, dentistry, or similar professions by a corporation infra § 124.

corporations, the supreme judicial court may restrain by injunction any corporation from assuming or exercising any franchise or privilege or transacting any kind of business not authorized by its charter and the laws of the commonwealth.—Attorney General v. Union Plumbing Co., 16 N.E.2d 89, 301 Mass. 86.

(5) In suit by attorney general under Gen.L.Ter.Ed. c 175 § 193A, an insurer was enjoined from enforcing provisions of agreement with its agent which violated statute regarding compensation to be paid agents procuring policies of industrial life insurance.—Attorney General v. Prudential Ins. Co. of America, 39 N.E. 2d 664, 310 Mass. 762.

(6) The remedy under such statute is exclusive; and the attorney-general cannot maintain an information in his own name on his own initiative against a corporation abusing its corporate franchise or usurping a franchise not granted to it.—Malone v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co., 83 N.E. 408, 197 Mass. 194.

(7) Under Civ.Code 1910 § 254 et seq, and §§ 6528, 6529, attorney general of the state has no authority to institute equitable action in name of state on relation of designated individuals against domestic corporation to enjoin it from doing acts alleged to be ultra vires.—Walker v. Where a railroad company[79] or a turnpike company[80] is locating its road in a manner beyond its corporate authority, it may be enjoined, and, according to some cases, an injunction may be granted where the corporate act is wholly unauthorized and is one for which there is no adequate measure of damages at law, a showing of irreparable injury not being required in such case.[81]

Restraining imposition of wrongful rates or tolls by public service corporations. A public service corporation may be restrained by injunction from charging rates in excess of those fixed by statute, ordinance, or contract at the suit of the state[82] or of a municipality.[83] It is not a ground for denying the injunction that penalties are provided against the agents of a company who may be guilty of a violation of the statute in this regard.[84]

Under some circumstances a private individual may be entitled to an injunction to prevent the collection from him of rates in excess of rates fixed in a contract between a municipality and defendant corporation.[85] It has been held that a shipper who shows special damage may enjoin a carrier from making excessive charges for the carrying of freight,[86] but it has also been held that a preliminary mandatory injunction will not issue at the suit of a private shipper to compel a railroad company to carry freight at the rate fixed.[87] Persons who, by statute, are specifically exempted from the payment of tolls may maintain a suit to enjoin a turnpike company from collecting tolls from such persons.[88]

§ 100. —— Acts Ultra Vires

Injunctions against acts in excess of corporate powers are discussed generally supra § 99, and injunctions against unauthorized or unlawful acts of corporation which infringe rights of stockholders are discussed generally infra § 103.

§ 101. —— Compelling Corporate Action

Injunction to compel the performance of a duty imposed on a public service corporation, or to prevent the discontinuance of performance of such duty, usually is an appropriate and available remedy.

Mandatory injunction to compel a public service corporation to perform duties imposed on it,[89] or an injunction to restrain such a corporation from discontinuing the performance of such duties,[90] has been regarded as a proper remedy, at least where the remedy by mandamus would not be adequate;[91] and the injunction may be granted in a suit by a municipality which has the requisite interest.[92] It has been held or recognized, however, that a mandatory injunction should not in general be granted in such case where the remedy by mandamus is appropriate and adequate,[93] but, in order to maintain the status quo, a mandatory injunction may be granted pending an action at law in which mandamus is sought[94] or pending a quo warranto action at law.[95]

Regulation

Where mere reasonable regulation of a service corporation is involved, equity may compel obedience to rules of municipality.—Borough of Midland v. Steubenville East Liverpool & Beaver Valley Traction Co., 150 A. 300, 300 Pa. 134.

An injunction to compel the performance, or to prevent the discontinuance of performance, of a duty may issue at the suit of an individual or another corporation where the invasion of his or its rights would work a serious injury for which there is no adequate remedy at law,[96] but it is not permissible to maintain a suit for injunction against a corporation to which the property and franchises of another corporation have been assigned where the assignor corporation, and not the assignee corporation, has wrongfully refused to furnish the service.[97] A public service corporation may not be prevented by injunction from discontinuing service to a person where such service is used in maintaining and conducting an illegal or immoral enterprise.[98]

Where the performance of certain acts is a condition precedent to the right of a public service corporation to enjoy certain rights or franchises, the exercise by it of such rights or franchises may be enjoined until such performance.[99] Under some circumstances a court of equity will not intervene to grant relief by injunction before the questions involved have been submitted to, and considered by, a state regulatory body which, under statute, has jurisdiction in that respect.[1]

Posting by-laws. Mandatory injunction is not the proper remedy to compel a corporation to comply with a statutory requirement to post corporate by-laws for inspection, which posting is designed primarily for the protection of the public.[2]

§ 102. —— Disposition of, or Dealings with, Corporate Property

Injunction is a proper remedy to prevent the misapplication of corporate funds and property.

The misapplication or misappropriation of corporate funds and property may be enjoined[3] at the suit of a stockholder,[4] or of a creditor who would otherwise be without adequate remedy.[5] It has been held, however, that a creditor is not entitled to an injunction if he does not have a lien or other legal claim on the assets of the corporation,[6] especially where the claim is an unliquidated one,[7] and that one holding a claim against a corporation is not entitled to an injunction if he has an adequate remedy at law.[8] The receiver of a corporation may thus prevent the improper distribution of corporate property.[9] On the other hand an outsider is not entitled to enjoin an issue of mortgage bonds on the ground that it will depreciate the stock which he may in future acquire.[10] Relief by injunction against the illegal or fraudulent proceedings of corporate officers should be sought by a stockholder[11] or other person whose pecuniary interest is affected;[12] but stockholders who have failed to comply with the terms of their stock subscription have no interest

Payment of unreasonable salaries

Minority stockholders were entitled to injunction against payment of unreasonable salaries, the particular case not being within the general rule that courts will not interfere with the proper management of the affairs of the corporation by the directors.—Hubbard v. Caserta, 144 A. 39, 108 Conn. 567.

Sale with approval of majority stockholders

(1) Fact that statute, Code § 3820a, authorising sale of corporate assets when approved by holders of two thirds of outstanding stock gives to dissenting stockholders remedy by appraisal and payment of appraised value does not render remedy at law adequate so as to defeat jurisdiction of equity to grant injunction.—Craddock-Terry Co. v. Powell, 25 S.E.2d 363, 181 Va. 417, rehearing 22 S.E.2d 30, 180 Va. 242.

(2) Under Corporation L. § 64a, where majority stockholders have authorized sale of corporate assets and approved terms and conditions, the only question in suit for injunction is whether such terms and conditions are expedient and for best interests of the corporation, and question whether any sale should be made cannot be reviewed, and in such case, discrepancy between what chancellor conceives to be fair price for corporate assets and proposed selling price must be so great as to be attributable to bad faith, before sale will be enjoined at instance of minority stockholders.—Allied Chemical & Dye Corporation v. Steel & Tube Co. of America, 122 A. 142, 14 Del.Ch. 64, 117.

(3) Sale of corporate property with approval of majority stockholders in general see Corporations § 515.

Temporary injunction

(1) Where stockholder was entitled to priority in receipts of building and loan association, which threatened to prorate receipts in liquidating its assets among all its stockholders, temporary injunction to preserve status quo could properly be granted.—Kelly v. Republic Building & Loan Ass'n, Tex.Civ.App., 34 S.W.2d 924.

(2) In stockholders' action to restrain consummation of purchase of stock of another corporation, stockholders were entitled to injunction pendente lite restraining acts which might irremediably prejudice their rights.—Weiss v. Fox Theatres Corporation, 242 N.Y.S. 283, 136 Misc. 312.

Special injunction

(1) In a suit by a stockholder, a special injunction was issued to restrain the corporation and its officers from acting illegally with respect to corporate funds, even though there was doubt as to the commission of the acts charged, where, if true, irreparable injury would be done and where the injunction would work no injury in any event.—Manderson v. Commercial Bank, 28 Pa. 379.

(2) Nature of special injunction see supra § 6.

Stock passing to heirs

The heirs at law of intestate whose entire estate consisted of almost all of a corporation's stock were entitled to injunction restraining agent, who had been appointed by heirs to manage corporation's affairs, from mismanaging assets, and a showing that agent was insolvent was not necessary where agent's acts were continuous and directly affected value of stock, since otherwise acts might give rise to multiplicity of suits.—Shingler v. Shingler, 192 S.E. 824, 184 Ga. 671.

Retention of assets pending recovery on claim

(1) Injunction against removal or disposal of assets until after trial of an action at law for damages should not have been granted.—B. L. E. Realty Corporation v. Mary Williams Co., 134 So. 47, 101 Fla. 254.

(2) Person instituting action on contested claim against going corporation may not enjoin distribution of its assets to its stockholders, pending determination of the claim, unless there is danger that sufficient funds will not be forthcoming to satisfy judgment which he may obtain.—Kohlsaat v. Main Island Creek Coal Co., 132 S.E. 721, 101 W.Va. 256.

Doubtful right to recover in pending litigation

Plaintiff, having unsuccessfully prosecuted action against corporation in state courts, and having petitioned federal supreme court for certiorari, did not have such probable right to corporation's assets as to justify injunction against contemplated sale thereof on theory that sale would hinder collection of plaintiff's anticipated judgment.—Yount-Lee Oil Co. v. Federal Crude Oil Co., Tex.Civ.App., 82 S.W.2d 987.

8. Tex.—Yount-Lee Oil Co. v. Federal Crude Oil Co., supra.

Preserving assets for enforcement of judgment

Plaintiff was not entitled to injunction against contemplated sale of corporation's assets on theory that sale would hinder collection of judgment which plaintiff expected to obtain in pending litigation, since plaintiff had adequate remedy at law by enforcing judgment directly against assets transferred if transfer were illegal, especially where proposed transferees, being parties to injunction suit, were charged with notice.—Yount-Lee Oil Co. v. Federal Crude Oil Co., supra.

Acts of directors that are in breach of trust and are calculated to work great injury to the corporation or to render it insolvent will be enjoined at the suit of stockholders;[14] but a court of equity will not control by injunction the exercise of discretion vested in directors or other corporate officers as to the disposition of corporate property and funds, when there is no fraud or breach of trust.[15] It has been held that payments out of corporate funds by the corporation will not be enjoined notwithstanding such payments contravene a contract between persons who have an interest in the corporation, where such payments are reasonable and are for a proper corporate purpose, and the corporation is not bound by the contract because it is not a party to it.[16]

It has been held that an injunction is impracticable to restrain and supervise the actions of officers on the ground of a deadlock in the management because of dissensions,[17] although it has also been held that the making of certain purchases for corporate purposes may be enjoined pending the determination of litigation arising out of a deadlock in corporate affairs.[18] Where there is an adequate remedy elsewhere for the illegal disposition of property or the misapplication of funds, no injunction will be granted.[19] An injunction against the sale of the assets of a corporation will not be granted where the sale has already been completed;[20] nor should an injunction be granted where it appears that there is no intention on the part of the governing authorities to dispose of corporate property.[21]

§ 103. —— Infringement or Denial of Rights of Stockholders

Injunction against a corporation or its officers to prevent unauthorized or unlawful acts is a proper remedy to protect the rights of stockholders.

Whenever necessary for the adequate protection of stockholders the court acting on equitable grounds may enjoin a corporation or its officers from doing unauthorized or unlawful acts.[22] In a suit by a Membership corporation's purchase out of capital of one of its memberships could not be enjoined as involving illegal reduction in number of outstanding memberships.—Keeler v. New York Hide Exchange, 247 N.Y.S. 482, 231 App.Div. 450.

Submission to shareholders of plan for sale

(1) Preferred stockholder was not entitled to equitable relief to prevent corporation and its directors from submitting to shareholders for adoption a plan for sale of corporate assets in exchange for securities of a stronger corporation to be distributed among stockholders of vendor corporation according to proposed amendment to articles of incorporation, where such proposal would not unfairly benefit one class of stock at the expense of another and dissenting stockholder had adequate remedy at law to obtain fair cash value of his stock.—Daus v. Otis Steel Co., 11 Ohio Supp. 94.

(2) In determining the fairness of the plan as bearing on the right to an injunction in such case, it was held that the fact that holders of sixty-four per cent of preferred stock owned thirty-eight per cent of common stock was entitled to little or no weight in absence of showing that such stockholders planned to force the adoption of the plan.—Daus v. Stockholder was entitled to an injunction against the unnecessary and fraudulent disclosure of corporation's secret processes to president, in violation of agreement under which the affairs of the corporation were to be conducted.—Alley v. Positype Corporation of America, 231 N.Y.S. 461, 224 App.Div. 603.

Acceptance of improper fidelity bonds

Where a stockholder of a banking corporation might suffer irreparable damage by the acceptance by the corporation of fidelity bonds of employees from insurance companies not operating under authority of New York insurance department as required by statute, equity may grant injunctive relief against the continued acceptance of such bonds.

stockholder brought for this purpose it has been held essential for him to show that he is acting bona fide in the interest of the corporation and not in the interest of persons hostile to it,[23] and, where the acts complained of have the approval of persons holding a large majority of the shares, an injunction should not be granted unless such acts are unquestionably wrongful and the case made generally is free from reasonable doubt;[24] but it is not necessary for the stockholder to show special injury to himself,[25] or pecuniary loss to the corporation as a result of the acts complained of,[26] although he must be diligent to prevent the illegal acts and prompt in applying to the courts.[27] It has been held that, if a board of directors has power to adopt a resolution, its motives do not concern the court and will not be considered in an action by stockholders and directors against other directors holding the majority of the stock and, in the absence of a showing of fraud or breach of trust, will not enjoin them from acting under such resolution.[28] In a suit to determine the ownership of shares of corporate stock, defendant may be enjoined pendente lite from doing any acts in conflict with plaintiff's claim.[29]

Injunctions in suit by stockholder with regard to disposition of, or dealings with, corporate property are discussed supra § 102. Injunction with respect to the voting of stock generally is discussed in the C.J.S. title Corporations § 558 c, and with respect to voting at election of corporate officers infra § 105.

Submission of questions to stockholders. It has been held that, under some circumstances, injunction may be granted to restrain the submission to stockholders for adoption or rejection by them of a proposed amendment of the by-laws of the corporation,[30] or of a resolution authorizing the directors to issue stock where to permit a vote would work a gross injustice to certain stockholders.[31] It has also been held, however, that an injunction will not be granted to prevent a meeting of stockholders to consider the repeal of a corporate by-law in the absence of a showing that such repeal would be unlawful.[32]

Inspection of books and records. In some jurisdictions, in view of the fact that mandamus is not an available remedy, injunction is a proper remedy to enforce the right of a stockholder to inspect the books and records of the corporation.[33] In other

(1) If it appears that directors were using their powers to obtain control of the corporation, or in any way other than in the honest exercise of their discretion, a preliminary injunction to maintain the status quo until hearing should be granted, even though the case of plaintiff stockholders is doubtful.—Borg v. International Silver Co., C.C.A.N.Y., 11 F. 2d 147, affirming, D.C., 11 F.2d 143.

(2) A preliminary injunction should not be granted on mere suspicion, however, at least where the balance of advantage does not weigh very strongly in plaintiffs' favor.—Borg v. International Silver Co., supra.

(3) In a suit by stockholders to enjoin the amendment of the certificate of incorporation, a preliminary injunction may be granted where the case involves only the construction and determination of validity of proposed amendments without extraneous evidence.—Costello v. Thomas Cusack Co., 124 A. 615, 96 N.J.Eq. 83, 90, affirmed 120 A. 15, 94 N.J.Eq. 423.

Where defendants were violating provisions of statute requiring banking institutions to obtain fidelity bonds of employees from insurance companies operating under authority of New York insurance department, the mere fact that no loss had resulted did not prevent an interested stockholder from obtaining an injunction to prevent further violations of the statute which had continued over a term of years.—Runcie v. Right of pledgee jurisdictions, however, mandatory injunction is not a proper remedy, in view of the fact that mandamus is an available and the proper remedy to compel inspection.[34] Remedies with respect to the right to inspect corporate books and records are discussed generally in Corporations § 510, and mandamus to enforce such right is discussed in detail in the C. J.S. title Mandamus § 223, also 38 C.J. p 794 note 97-p 797 note 39.

Pledgee was entitled to sue pledgor to restrain pledgor from interfering with pledgee's rights in good faith and under reasonable regulations, in examining corporation's books.—Scott v. Flint River Pecan Co., 126 S.E. 769, 159 Ga. 668.

Disposal or withholding of stock. The forfeiture and sale of shares of stock, where authorized, will not be enjoined;[35] but, if wrongful, the stockholder is entitled to an injunction,[36] unless his remedy at law is adequate;[37] and an injunction will be granted to prevent a fraudulent abuse of the statutory power to sell with resultant fraudulent preference of some creditors of the stockholder over other of his creditors.[38]

It has been held that, where a stockholder has surrendered the certificate for his shares in order to have certificates made in smaller denominations, he is entitled to an injunction to restrain the disposal of part of such shares to another, pending determination of his suit to compel issuance of such part to him,[39] but it has also been held that a stockholder claiming the right to additional shares is not entitled to a temporary injunction to restrain a proposed sale by directors, where a sufficient number of shares remain available to satisfy the claim of such stockholder.[40] According to some cases the fact that the corporation deprives a stockholder of his right to a proportionate share of new stock by a contract with third persons is not ground for an injunction against the performance of such contract by the corporation if the corporation is able to respond in damages to such stockholder.[41]

Issuance of bonds. A proposed corporate bond issue will not be enjoined at the suit of minority stockholders as too large, where the bonds are to be issued in amounts necessary to meet the company's requirements, since, if the demands become excessive, relief may then be applied for.[42] So a proposed issue of corporate bonds convertible into stock to be offered to the stockholders in proportion to their holdings of stock will not be enjoined, although stockholders failing to respond will suffer tremendous loss by depreciation in the value of their stock, all stockholders being dealt with alike.[43]

Contracts of corporation. A minority stockholder may be entitled to an injunction to restrain the execution of a contract by the corporation which is designed to serve the interest of persons in control of the corporation in contravention of their fiduciary duty to the corporation.[44] An injunction, sought by a minority stockholder, to restrain the performance of a contract by the corporation may be denied, however, on the ground that the contract is beneficial to the corporation.[45]

Contract between stockholders. Injunction may be a proper remedy to prevent violation of a valid

Compliance with injunction condition precedent to suspension of penalties

Books and records out of state

A court of equity will balance the conveniences of the parties in determining whether a mandatory injunction will be granted to compel a domestic corporation to produce books of account, kept in a foreign state in which the corporation is doing business, so that a stockholder may enforce his right to inspect such books under the statute dealing with corporate accounts, and such relief will be denied if the court finds that to compel the corporation to send its books to Ohio would interrupt its business to the great damage of the corporation and other stockholders.—Cornell v. agreement with respect to corporate affairs, to which all stockholders are parties.[46]

§ 104. Corporate Officers

In general injunction is not a proper remedy to determine the right to a corporate office.

In general it is not the province of a court of equity to decide, in a suit for an injunction, the right to a corporate office,[47] although it may do so as an incident to matters otherwise within its jurisdiction.[48]

Under some circumstances an injunction may be granted to prevent the amendment of the by-law of a corporation for the purpose of preventing continued control of the corporate trust by a self-perpetuating governing body.[49]

Injunctions against corporate officers with respect to infringement or denial of rights of stockholders in general are discussed supra § 103, and with respect to disposition of, or dealings with, corporate property, supra § 102. Various other matters relating to injunctions involving corporate officers are discussed infra §§ 105–107.

Mandatory injunction. Under some circumstances a mandatory injunction will lie to compel a corporate officer to perform certain acts connected with corporate affairs.[50]

§ 105. —— Election, Removal, and Reinstatement

a. Election
b. Removal or reinstatement

a. Election

Usually the holding of an election of corporate officers will not be enjoined; nor will a disputed election be tested on an application for an injunction; but the improper voting of particular stock at such an election may be enjoined under some circumstances.

The holding of a corporate election will rarely be enjoined,[51] although in a proper case equity has power to do so;[52] nor is an application for an injunction the proper method of settling a disputed election.[53]

Injunction to prevent voting by member or stockholder. The propriety of an injunction to prevent the improper voting of certain stock at an election of corporate officers has been recognized,[54] and it has been held that, where stock in a corporation is transferred without consideration, for the purpose of fraudulently obtaining more votes than the real owner of the stock might otherwise cast, in order to control an election, the voting of such stock may be enjoined.[55] An injunction to restrain a person from voting at an election should not be granted, however, if it is not clearly shown that he is not entitled to vote,[56] or if there is not a sufficient showing of serious or irreparable injury, apprehended or threatened;[57] and an injunction will not be granted where its real purpose is to control an election by keeping the majority from ruling.[58]

In a proper case election officers may be enjoined from receiving the votes of persons not entitled to vote.[59]

b. Removal or Reinstatement

Usually injunction is not a proper remedy to remove a corporate officer from his office or to restore to office one wrongfully removed.

Injunction is not the proper remedy for the removal of an officer of a private corporation,[60] or for restoring one wrongfully removed.[61] Under some circumstances, however, a corporate officer may be entitled to an injunction pendente lite to prevent the holding of a stockholders' meeting for the purpose of removing such officer from his office,[62] and an injunction may be a proper remedy to restrain ouster of a stockholder from a corporate office in violation of a valid contract to which all stockholders are parties.[63]

§ 106. —— Restraining Corporate Officer

Officers of a corporation in general will not be enjoined from acting as such within their powers and in the exercise of their discretion.

In the absence of special legislation, officers of a corporation will not be enjoined from acting as such within their powers and in the exercise of discretion,[64] even though they are only de facto officers,[65] for the reason in general that there is an adequate remedy at law.[66]

While there is some authority to the contrary,[67] it has generally been held that, where an injunction to prevent an officer from acting as such is really to test the validity of his election, it will be refused,[68] since the remedy at law is usually ade-

Injunctions against corporate officers with respect to disposition of, or dealings with, corporate property are discussed supra § 102, and with respect to infringement or denial of rights of stockholders in general, supra § 103; and injunctions to restrain acts within discretion of corporate officers in general are discussed infra § 107.

§ 107. —— Discretion of Corporate Officer

In general injunctions against acts of corporate officers which are within the limits of the discretion of such officers will not be granted.

In general acts of corporate officers connected with the management of the corporation, which are within the limits of their discretion, will not be enjoined,[70] but, even with respect to acts which are within the general power of corporate officers, an injunction pendente lite to maintain the status quo may be granted on a showing that such acts constitute an abuse of discretion.[71]

a. General Rule

Injunction will not issue to restrain public officers from performing any official act which is not in excess of the authority reposed in them, but unlawful acts by public officers may, in a proper case, be restrained.

Courts of equity have no power to restrain public officers by injunction from performing any official act which they are by law required to perform, or acts which are not in excess of the authority and discretion reposed in them.[72] Nevertheless, it is a rule of very general application that, where public officers are acting in breach of trust,[73] or unlawfully or without authority or threatening to do so,[74] and, as discussed infra subdivision c of this section, such acts may be enjoined where they will result in irreparable injury, or will require a multiplicity of suits at law to obtain redress. This is, it has been held, not an action or suit against the state or county.[75]

Complainant must clearly show actual illegal action on the part of defendants;[76] and the presumption is in favor of the legality of the action taken by them.[77]

Effect of constitutional and statutory provisions. It has been held that, under a constitutional provision that justice shall be administered without prejudice, completely and without delay and that every man shall have a remedy by due course of law for injury done him in person, property, or reputation, an injunction is as available against public officers for a violation of private rights as any other remedy.[78] Under some statutes an injunction cannot be granted to prevent the execution of a public statute, by officers of the law, for the public benefit.[79] It has been held that this power to enjoin public officers is not affected by a statute providing that "officers of the law" shall not be enjoined;[80] and that a statute assuming to exempt a certain class of officers from liability to injunctive process is unconstitutional.[81]

Compelling performance of official duties. As a general rule courts of equity will not compel by injunction the performance by public officers of their official duties;[82] but a court of equity may compel public officers or boards to act in a matter with respect to which they have jurisdiction or authority,[83] particularly where the act is merely ministerial,[84] but the court will not control or guide the exercise of their authority.[85] The courts by injunction cannot compel public officers to do more than the law permits them to do.[86]

It has been held that a court of equity has no power to compel a public officer as an individual to undo, set aside, and make null that which he has done in his official capacity.[87]

Discretion of court. In accordance with the general rule discussed supra § 14, the granting or refusal of an injunction against public officers and boards, as a general rule, rests in the sound discretion of the court under the facts and circumstances of the particular case.[88]

b. Discretionary Acts

In the absence of an abuse of discretion, the exercise of discretionary power vested in public officers will not be controlled by injunction.

tion is fraudulent or in bad faith,[90] or that it amounts to an abuse of the discretion so vested in them;[91] and this is true even though the powers vested in such officers are quasi judicial as well as administrative;[92] and especially is this true where the restraining of the officer's action would impose a large additional expense on the public.[93]

Courts will not hear proofs and attempt to determine whether official discretion is wisely exercised or not.[94] Where the law casts both a right and a duty on an officer which involves exercise of discretion, the officer's conduct with respect to his duty or discretion is no more to be controlled by injunction than by mandamus.[95] Interference in such a case would be to interfere with the ordinary functions of government.[96] Courts cannot legislate or invade the other departments of government in matters of policy,[97] and courts will act with extreme caution where the granting of injunctive relief will result in embarrassment to the operations of government.[98] However, the general rule has no application where there has been fraud or collusion on the part of the public officer in the performance of his duty,[99] and an injunction may be issued in case of a gross abuse of discretion,[1] but to constitute an abuse of such discretion it must appear that it was exercised on grounds or for reasons clearly untenable, or to an extent clearly unreasonable.[2]

Malice or motive

(1) Equity will not restrain where there is mere abuse of power on the part of a public officer in doing, from a wrong motive or to accomplish an ulterior purpose, that which the law authorizes.—Duke Power Co. v. Greenwood County, C.C.A.S.C., 91 F. 2d 665, affirming, D.C., 19 F.Supp. 932, certiorari granted 58 S.Ct. 120, 302 U.S. 675, 82 L.Ed. 521, affirmed 58 S.Ct. 306, 302 U.S. 485, 82 L.Ed. 381.

(2) The mere fact that a public officer hates a person and may be glad to see him suffer as a consequence of that officer's official act is not enough to justify interference by the courts, but the rule is other-

c. Injury Sustained and Lack of Other Remedy

Complainant must show, before he can secure an injunction against the acts of a public officer, that such acts will result in irreparable injury to him and that there is no other adequate remedy available.

To be entitled to an injunction against a public officer or board, complainant must show that the illegal acts complained of will result in irreparable injury to himself,[3] or will require a multiplicity of suits at law to obtain redress.[4] Courts, however, are reluctant to grant injunctive relief against public officers,[5] and an injunction will not be granted where the injury is slight or doubtful,[6] or where on the facts the right to the injunction is doubtful.[7] Mere apprehension of unauthorized acts by public officers will not authorize the issuance of an injunction,[8] but the prevention by injunction of impending injury by unlawful official action is proper,[9] and an officer may be enjoined from proceeding illegally whenever he threatens to, or is about to, proceed in that manner.[10] Even where the right to an injunction might otherwise exist, the court may properly refuse it by reason of plaintiff's acquiescence in the acts complained of,[11] or because of acts raising an estoppel against him.[12]

Definite property right

It is the general and perhaps the universal rule that public officers will be enjoined from the enforcement of state or federal laws only when the party seeking such injunction has a definite property right which will, without such relief, be damaged or destroyed.—Brandenburg v. Doyle, D.C.Ill., 12 F.Supp. 342.

Deprivation of patronage

Generally, no person in any business has such an interest in possible customers as to enable him to restrain the exercise of a proper power by the state on the ground that he will be deprived of patronage; but this rule is inapplicable to one asking protection against unlawful interference with patrons and the consequent destruction of his business and property.—Pierce v. Society of the Sisters of the Holy Names of Jesus and Mary, Or., 45 S.Ct. 571, 268 U.S. 510, 69 L.Ed. 1070, 39 A.L. Injury distinct from that suffered by others

To entitle one to relief against real or imaginary injuries from unauthorized acts of public officials, he must bring his case under some acknowledged head of equity jurisdiction and show what special injury he will sustain thereby distinct from that suffered by others.—Metropolis Pub. Co. v. City of Miami, 129 So. 913, 100 Fla. 784—Rickman v. Whitehurst, 72 Fla. 152, 74 So. 205.

may belong to the public,[13] individuals,[14] or corporations.[15] Ordinarily, however, before an individual can maintain an action to restrain a public officer or board he must show individual injury or special damage peculiar to himself.[16]

Complainant must show also that there is no other available adequate remedy.[17] Where the action of the officer amounts to a mere trespass, for which the remedy at law is adequate, no injunction will be granted.[18] So where there is a remedy by certiorari,[19] appeal,[20] mandamus,[21] or writ of prohibition,[22] or where another remedy is provided by statute,[23] no injunction should be granted.

Taxpayers have the right to restrain public servants from transcending their lawful powers, or violating their legal duties in any unauthorized mode, which will increase the burden of taxation or otherwise injuriously affect the taxpayers or their property.[24]

Completed wrongs. An injunction against a public officer or board lies only to prevent threatened injury, and has no application to wrongs which have been committed.[25]

Temporary injunctions. A temporary injunction against public officers and boards and municipalities may be granted where it is necessary to preserve the property in status quo during the pendency of the suit in which the rights to it are to be decided.[26] The issuance of such a temporary injunction rests in the sound discretion of the trial court guided by established rules and principles of equity jurisprudence.[27] Preliminary restraint against public officers should not be ordered unless on the pressure of urgent necessity,[28] and ordinarily a temporary injunction against public officers will be refused where plaintiff's right to an injunction is doubtful[29] or is based on facts determinable only by trial.[30] To justify a temporary injunction against a public officer or board, danger of irreparable injury to plaintiff must be shown.[31] Where great and irreparable injury may be done private citizens by officers acting under a mistaken belief of their authority,[32] or by the unlawful acts of public offi-

d. Police Officers

Police officers will not be enjoined from performing their proper duties.

Police officers will not be enjoined from performing their proper duties in the exercise of the general police power,[35] even though the acts may be performed in an oppressive and unlawful way.[36] The remedy is ordinarily by action for damages,[37] or by a criminal prosecution.[38] In accordance with this rule, a system of picketing or espionage of a person's place of business by the police will not be enjoined where the officers had reasonable grounds to believe that plaintiff was violating the law.[39]

Where, however, it is shown that illegal acts of police officers will result in irreparable injury to the property rights of complainant,[40] or will result in irreparable injury to fundamental personal rights,[41] of complainant, if an injunction is not issued, injunctive relief may be available, as where continued unlawful trespasses are committed under the guise of preventing violations of the law,[42] or where no claim is made that violations of law had ever been committed on the premises,[43] or where there is nothing more than the suggestion of a suspicion that the law had even been violated on the premises.[44] Courts should be slow in issuing injunctions against police officers,[45] and the writ should issue only in cases where a clear right to such relief is established.[46] An injunction will not issue on a mere apprehension that police officers will commit an unlawful act.[47]

The general rule prohibiting the issuance of injunctions to prevent the doing of an act that has already been performed applies in respect of unlawful acts committed by police officers. The mere fact that they have committed unlawful acts will not authorize an injunction against them where there is no showing that a repetition of the acts is threatened.[48]

Assistance in law violations. Under the rule that he who comes into equity must come with clean hands,[49] an injunction will not issue against police officers in order to assist complainant in violating the law.[50]

§ 109. Federal or State Boards and Officers

a. Federal officers or boards
b. State officers or boards

a. Federal Officers or Boards

Injunction will not issue to control the action of federal officers or boards in the exercise of their powers, but acts beyond their authority or powers may be enjoined where irreparable injury will result therefrom to a complainant who has no adequate remedy at law.

The general rule is that the judicial power will not interpose by injunction to limit or direct the action of departmental officers of the federal government in respect of matters pending within their jurisdiction and control.[51] If engaged in the performance of a duty which involves the exercise of either judgment or discretion, they are entitled to protection from interference by the judicial power.[52] On the other hand, exemption of the United States from suit does not protect its officers from personal liability to persons whose rights to property they have invaded by acts not within the scope of their authority,[53] or from injunctive process where their ultra vires acts will result in irreparable injury,[54] or where their ultra vires acts will re-medium of fraud with petitioner's knowledge.—Green v. Hart, D.C. Conn., 41 F.2d 855.

Under statute authorizing president during national emergency to requisition machinery, tools, or materials whenever president determines use thereof is needed for national defense, even if executive determination that all other means of obtaining use of property on fair and reasonable terms had been exhausted was erroneous, court could not grant injunctive relief.—Alpirn v. not suffered[62] irreparable injury or injury distinct from that of other members of the public or,

Administrative remedies

(1) As a general rule all administrative remedies must be exhausted before a suit for injunction will lie.

U.S.—Myers v. Bethlehem Shipbuilding Corporation, Mass., 58 S.Ct. 459, 303 U.S. 41, 82 L.Ed. 638, reversing, C.C.A., 88 F.2d 154, affirming, D.C., Bethlehem Shipbuilding Corporation v. Myers, 15 F. Mackenzie, 58 S.Ct. 27, 302 U.S. 667, 82 L.Ed. 515—Aron v. Federal Trade Commission, D.C.Pa., 50 F. Supp. 280—Sanco Piece Dye Works v. Herrick, D.C.N.Y., 33 F.Supp. 80.

Cal.—U. S. v. Superior Court, 120 P. 2d 26, 19 Cal.2d 189.

(2) An inapplicable administrative remedy does not preclude the issuance of an injunction.—Darger v. Hill, C.C.A.Cal., 76 F.2d 198, affirming, D.C., Hill v. Darger, 8 F. Supp 189.

(3) Where no question is made of the power of an administrative body to deal with the subject matter of the controversy, but the complaint is that the administrative body improperly exercised such authority, the administrative methods for review must first be exhausted.—Hart Coal Corporation v. Sparks, D.C.Ky., 9 F.Supp. 825.

(4) Where the complaint is that the administrative authority has no power to act with reference to the subject matter of the controversy, a failure to exhaust the administrative remedy does not bar relief by injunction.—Yarnell v. Hillsborough Packing Co., C.C.A.Fla., 70 F. 2d 435, 92 A.L.R. 1475—Chester C. Fosgate Co. v. Kirkland, D.C.Fla., 19 F.Supp. 152—Hart Coal Corporation v. Sparks, D.C.Ky., 9 F.Supp. 825.

(5) The federal communications commission having adopted an order under its rule-making power could not insist that radio network seeking to enjoin enforcement of order be relegated to that judicial review which would be exclusive if the rule-making power had never been exercised and consequently had never subjected network to threatened irreparable injury.—Columbia Broadcasting System v. U. S., N.Y., 62 S. Ct. 1194, 316 U.S. 407, 86 L.Ed. 1563, reversing, D.C., National Broadcasting Co. v. U. S., 44 F.Supp. 688.

(6) Where radio network seeking to enjoin enforcement of federal communications commission's order promulgating chain broadcasting regulations alleged that affiliates were cancelling or threatening to cancel contracts to conform to regulations and attacked regulations to avoid irreparable injury which would result, commission's minute setting up procedure by which validity of regulations might be tested on application for a license did not afford an adequate basis for requiring network to seek relief by intervention in a proceeding on application for a license.—Columbia Broadcasting System v. U. S., supra.

Great expense

The fact that complainant has been at great expense in constructing the property sought to be protected does not entitle him to an injunction where he has not exhausted the administrative remedy or appealed therefrom as permitted by law.—Black River Valley Broadcasts v. McNinch, 101 F.2d 235, 69 App.D. C. 311, certiorari denied 59 S.Ct. 793, 307 U.S. 623, 83 L.Ed. 1501.

Interlocutory orders

To permit judicial review by injunction of every procedural, preliminary, and interlocutory order or ruling by which a person may consider himself aggrieved, would afford opportunity for constant delays in the course of administrative proceedings and would render orderly administrative procedure impossible, and result in bringing to the courts such an avalanche of trivial procedural questions as would largely monopolize their time and energies. —Utah Fuel Co. v. National Bituminous Coal Commission, 101 F.2d 426, 69 App.D.C. 333, certiorari granted 59 S.Ct. 253, 305 U.S. 575, 83 L.Ed. 362, affirmed 59 S.Ct. 409, 306 U.S. 56, 83 L.Ed. 483.

Plaintiff held to have no other adequate remedy

U.S.—Ganley v. Wallace, D.C., 17 F. Supp. 115, reversed on other grounds Wallace v. Ganley, 95 F. 2d 364, 68 App.D.C. 235.

D.C.—Gilbert v. Sargent, 19 F.2d 681, 57 App.D.C. 207, followed in Linkins v. Sargent, 19 F.2d 683, 57 App.D.C. 209.

The existence of statutory means, which might be legal of consummating proposed transfer of public lands in New Mexico for private lands, did not preclude court from enjoining interior department officials from carrying out proposed transfer in an unlawful manner.—Red Canyon Sheep Co. v. Ickes, 98 F.2d 308, 69 App.D.C. 27.

Loss of business due to the publicity incident to an administrative investigation is not such irreparable damage as will authorize the issuance of an injunction.—Arrow Distilleries v. Alexander, D.C.D.C., 24 F. Supp. 880, affirmed 59 S.Ct. 489, 306 U.S. 615, 83 L.Ed. 1023.

Rules and regulations

Radio network's standing to maintain action to enjoin enforcement of federal communications commission's order promulgating regulations was not affected by fact that regulations were not directed to network and did not in terms compel action by it or impose penalties on it for its action or failure to act, but it was enough that regulations purported to operate to alter and affect adversely network's contractual rights and business relations with radio station owners.—Columbia Broadcasting System v. U. S., N.Y., 62 S.

likewise, has not been threatened with,[63] irreparable injury or injury distinct from that of other members of the public, or where plaintiff comes into court with unclean hands.[64] Suit will not be entertained to enjoin the enforcement of an unconstitutional act or order when not brought against the official charged with its enforcement,[65] nor will a federal officer be enjoined from performing an act which there is no likelihood of his performing.[66]

Officers of the land department. The acts of the officers of the United States land department, so long as within the scope of their powers as conferred on them by statute, will not be enjoined.[67] The determination as to what person is entitled to certain land scrip,[68] to a patent to certain public land,[69] to a right of preëmption,[70] to the right to make entry in the office of the register and receiver,[71] or to the right to make additional homestead entries,[72] is a judicial function that has been intrusted to the land department and in its performance the land officers will not be enjoined, at least if the construction placed on them by the statutes which they are required to construe is a possible one.[73] The same has been held as to the decision whether or not certain land is open for settlement;[74] whether in interference proceedings there has been an abandonment by another party to the interference;[75] whether lands are mineral in character;[76] and as to the cancellation of an entry for lands.[77] On the other hand, when the officers of the land department go beyond their jurisdiction, they are liable to be enjoined just as are other public officers, if the elements necessary to give jurisdiction to a court of equity to issue an injunction are present.[78] If the head of a department has no power at all to do the act complained of, he is as much subject to an injunction as he would be to a mandamus if he refused to do an act which the law plainly required him to do.[79]

b. State Officers or Boards

Illegal acts of state officers or boards resulting in or threatening irreparable injury to plaintiff may be enjoined where there is no adequate remedy at law available.

A state itself cannot be enjoined,[80] and state officers or boards will not be enjoined from the performance of duties imposed by valid statutes,[81] or

Placing property beyond jurisdiction
No injunction is necessary in aid of a suit by citizens of a neutral country to recover from alien property custodian proceeds of sale of property seized by him as enemy property, in view of a provision of the statute that the money or property must be held by the custodian or in the treasury to await the final decree in such suit, since it must be presumed that the custodian and the treasurer will perform their statutory duty, and not attempt to put the property beyond the jurisdiction of the court.—Sigg-Fehr v. Use of military force

(1) The use of military force illegally to deprive plaintiff of his property rights may be enjoined.

U.S.—Constantin v. Smith, D.C.Tex., 57 F.2d 227, appeal dismissed Sterling v. Constantin, 53 S.Ct. 190, 287 U.S. 378, 77 L.Ed. 375—U. S. v. Phillips, D.C.Okl., 33 F. Supp. 261—Strutwear Knitting Co. v. Olson, D.C.Minn., 13 F.Supp. 384.

Okl.—Russell Petroleum Co. v. Walker, 19 P.2d 582, 162 Okl. 216.

(2) Where there is no actual or apparent violence threatening public safety, the use of military force by state officers which interferes with property rights will be enjoined.—U. S. v. Phillips, D.C.Okl., 33 F.Supp. 261.

(3) Suit to enjoin governor of state, adjutant general of state, and mayor of city from preventing plaintiff from using its property in lawful manner was not rendered moot by withdrawal of troops with which interference was made, in the absence of assurance that the acts complained of would not be repeated if the injunction was denied, or of recognition of plaintiff's right to use its property free from interference. —Strutwear Knitting Co. v. Olson, supra.

Apprehension well founded

The facts stated must be such as to satisfy the court that the board is not only exceeding its lawful jurisdiction, but that the apprehension of irreparable injury is well founded.—Milk Commission v. Dade County Dairies, 200 So. 83, 145 Fla. 579.

Defense held insufficient

In suit to enjoin insurance commissioner's enforcement of order, affirmative defense charging attempted monopoly was held to be insufficient to warrant denial of motion for decree.—Olsness v. Home Ins. Co., C.C.A.N.D., 14 F.2d 907.

Facts considered

In suit to enjoin state's proceeding to investigate allegedly unlawful trade practices of nonresident producer-affiliated exhibitors engaged in licensing motion picture films shown in state, facts to be considered in determining right to injunctive relief do not depend on probabilities of truth of facts charged by state but depend on state's power to charge and to consider whether, on proof which it intends to adduce, such charge is true or false.—Paramount Publix Corporation v. Hill, D.C.Wis., 11 F.Supp. 478.

Injunction properly denied

Laches

Where complaint filed before Eclectic State Medical Board more than nine years after issuance of license sought revocation of physician's license on ground that physician illegally and fraudulently obtained diploma from medical school and that the license issued to him was obtained by fraud and deception, physician could not enjoin the board from conducting a hearing on the complaint on the ground that the board was barred by "laches," since the board had a right to proceed after the fraud, if any, had been discovered.—Eclectic State Medical Board v. Beatty, 156 S.W.2d 246, 203 Ark. 294.

Law violator

Injunction will not issue to aid a law violator in his violation of the law.—Panama Refining Co. v. Railroad Commission of Texas, D.C.Tex., 16 F.Supp. 289—Hercules Oil Co. v. Thompson, D.C.Tex., 10 F.Supp. 988.

Acts sought to be enjoined held not illegal.—Purviance v. Compton, 271 P. 120, 94 Cal.App. 277.

Proceedings of prior board

A physician could not enjoin Eclectic State Medical Board from conducting a hearing on a complaint to revoke physician's license on ground that present board members had no right to review proceedings of a board composed of different members at the time physician was licensed.—Eclectic State Medical Board v. where it is merely apprehended that a state board may erroneously exercise its discretion,[94] or where an injunction is sought to aid in the violation of the laws of the state.[95]

The performance of acts which have already been committed,[96] or which the officer or board have no authority to perform and which they have not expressed an intention of performing,[97] will not be enjoined.

Statutes relating to the issuance of injunctions against state officers or boards are to be given a reasonable interpretation so as to effectuate the intention of the legislature.[98] Relief by injunction against a state body or officer has been held not to be within the scope of a statute abolishing writs and orders of certiorari to review, mandamus, and prohibition, and providing other procedure therefor.[99] A statute providing that no court can compel, by any writ, the performance of any act or duty of any state officer does not limit the power of the courts to restrain the performance of an illegal and unconstitutional act by a state officer.[1] A statute providing that any order of a particular board substantially affecting rights of any interested party may be reviewed by any court of competent jurisdiction has been held to authorize an injunction against the enforcement of an order of such board.[2] A statute prohibiting the issuance of a writ of injunction against the lessees of the state, or the officers or employees of the state, to prevent the exploration for oil, gas, or other minerals on state property does not prevent a lessee from obtaining an injunction to restrain state officers from interfering with his leasehold rights.[3]

Compelling acts. State officers and boards will not be compelled by injunction to perform their duties,[4] other than mere ministerial acts.[5]

Governor. In some jurisdictions the rule seems to be that whatever doctrine is applicable in respect of inferior state officers, state courts under no circumstances have power to issue an injunction against the governor of a state acting in his official capacity as such,[6] and it is immaterial whether such act proceeded from an error of judgment or misapprehension of official duty under the law,[7] and whether the acts are of a character strictly ministerial or are such as call for the exercise of discretion and judgment alone.[8] On the other hand,

7. Minn.—Western R. Co. v. De Graff, 6 N.W. 341, 27 Minn. 1.

8. Minn.—Western R. Co. v. De Graff, supra.

the supreme court of the United States has held that a state governor may be enjoined from the commission of acts in pursuance of an unconstitutional statute where irreparable injury will result therefrom,[9] the view being taken that he is acting in his own wrong and on his own responsibility and is personally liable;[10] and it has been held by a number of the state courts that illegal acts committed by the governor of the state which are ministerial in their nature and for which there is no adequate remedy at law may be enjoined,[11] although the courts will not undertake by injunction to control or direct the exercise by the governor of political or discretionary acts the performance of which he assumes,[12] or enjoin the commission of acts for which there is an adequate remedy at law.[13] The illegal use of military force by a governor may be enjoined,[14] and a governor is subject to injunction if he retains military personnel on the grounds of complainant in uniform and on active duty under an illegal declaration of martial law.[15]

State railroad commissions. A state railroad commission will be enjoined from acting illegally to the irreparable damage of complainant who has no other adequate remedy available,[16] but injunction will not issue where there is available another remedy for reviewing the action of the commission.[17] A state railroad commission will not be enjoined from considering the formulation and promulgation of rules for the government of common carriers doing business within the state.[18] An injunction will not be granted to restrain the enforcement of orders of a commission when the action commanded by the orders had already been taken and suspended by order of the commissioner.[19] On the other hand, injunction is the proper remedy to restrain acts of the commission which are beyond its jurisdiction.[20] The rule that equity cannot enjoin the administration of criminal justice, discussed infra § 156, will not preclude enjoining a commission from enforcing an unconstitutional statute where the proceedings which the state authorizes to be instituted for violation thereof are in the civil courts alone in which the violators are to be made defendants in actions of assumpsit to recover penalties.[21]

Public service commissions. Where there is a clear, certain, and adequate remedy at law, a court of equity will not enjoin the commission of alleged unauthorized acts by a public service commission,[22] or prevent it from taking cognizance of a matter

Importance of question

In suit to enjoin governor from certifying to secretary of state of United States legislature's resolution ratifying proposed amendment to federal Constitution, importance of question whether ratification was valid required a decision on the merits, regardless of whether governor and other defendants had waived question of plaintiffs' right to maintain suit.—Wise v. Injury to legal rights

Within the limits of the power conferred on him by the constitution and laws, the governor is not subject to control by the courts, nor can an injunction direct or restrain him in the exercise of his power. Any act, however, which may injure a citizen in his legal rights, under the law, is subject to redress in the courts.—State v. McPhail, 180 So. 387, 182 Miss. 360.

16. Extreme penalties

The penalties imposed for violations of the statute and rules of the commission may be so extreme as to make the remedies at law inadequate.—Texoma Natural Gas Co. v. Railroad Commission of Texas, D.C. Tex., 59 F.2d 750.

No provision for review

An order of a commission prescribing maximum rates for services performed, if no provision for review by the courts is made, entitles one who claims the rates to be confiscatory to a review by a court of equity especially if the penalties for violation of the order are so severe that every one would be deterred from testing it in a criminal prosecution.—Allen v. Omaha Live Stock Commn. Co., C.C.A.Neb., 275 F. 1.

Order to replace track

Where a railroad company tore up a spur track, to replace which would cost a large sum of money, which would be wasted if it should be finally determined that the railroad was acting within its rights, and where damages will adequately compensate the shipper who used the track, a temporary injunction against an order of a commission to replace the track should be granted.—Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Railroad Commn., 185 N.W. 632, 175 Wis. 534.

17. Train service

Under some statutes providing means for reviewing orders as to rates, a temporary injunction will not issue as to such orders, but such an injunction may be issued as to orders relating to train service.—State v. District Court of First Judicial Dist. in and for Lewis and Clark County, 163 P. 115, 53 Mont. 229.

within its jurisdiction on the ground that it may reach an erroneous decision.[23] The court, however, in the exercise of its equitable powers, can entertain a bill to enjoin a public utilities commission from exercising powers not conferred on it or unconstitutionally conferred on it.[24] Where a public service commission possessing delegated legislative authority has the executive power to put its act into effect and it enacts an unconstitutional or void law or rule of action or order, it may be enjoined by the courts from enforcing it.[25] Ordinarily mandamus is a clear, certain, and adequate remedy to compel the performance of its duties by a public service commission, and a court of equity will not interfere by injunction where no other grounds of equitable jurisdiction exist.[26]

A temporary restraining order pending a motion for injunction against a public service commission will not be granted unless, in accordance with the statute governing the matter "there appears to be danger of irreparable injury."[27] Generally the power will be exercised only for the purpose of preserving the existing status.[28] In order to warrant the allowance of an interlocutory injunction against the enforcement of orders made by public service boards or commissions, it is necessary to show clearly that such order is arbitrary, unreasonable, or confiscatory in its nature,[29] in which event its enforcement may ordinarily be enjoined.[30] Injunctions pendente lite to restrain the enforcement of orders of a public service commission relating to rates will not be granted where it is expressly provided by statute that all rates fixed by the commission shall be deemed reasonable and just and shall remain in full force and effect until final determination by the courts having jurisdiction.[31]

§ 110. County or Town Boards and Officers

Injunction will not issue to control the exercise of the discretionary powers vested in county or town boards and officers, but an abuse of their discretion, or acts clearly beyond their powers, may be enjoined by one suffering irreparable injury thereby and who has no other adequate remedy available.

tee,[36] are vested with discretionary power, an injunction will not issue to control or prevent acts done by them in the exercise of this discretion in the absence of fraud or an abuse of discretion. County officers cannot be enjoined merely for acts of mistaken judgment.[37]

On the other hand acts by county commissioners which are plainly an abuse of the discretion vested in them may be enjoined.[38] Likewise, the officers of a county or town may be restrained by injunction when they are proceeding illegally to the irreparable injury of complainant.[39] The right to injunctive relief, however, must clearly appear,[40] and injunction will not issue where there is another adequate remedy available.[41] Ordinarily, plaintiff must show, in addition to the illegality of the acts of the county board or officer, an injury to himself from the illegal act peculiar and distinct from that suffered by the public in general.[42] While a showing that threatened injury is imminent is sufficient,[43] it must be shown that the threatened injury is certainly impending,[44] and mere allegations that a county board is threatening to pass resolutions which, if passed, will be unlawful or ineffective constitute no ground for interference with the preliminary internal functioning of the board.[45] Injunction will not lie against a county officer to restrain him from doing an act which he has no authority to do and which he has not announced an intention of doing.[46]

Compelling performance of duty. A county officer ordinarily will not be compelled by injunction to perform his duties, the remedy, if any, being either by mandamus or by an action on the officer's bond.[47] The performance of a mere ministerial duty involving no discretion, however, may be compelled by injunction.[48]

Completed acts. Injunction will not be granted to restrain acts already completed by county or town officers.[49]

Removal of county seat. The illegal removal of a county seat may be enjoined,[50] as where there is an entire absence of legal authority to initiate proceedings for the removal of the county seat, being taken under an unconstitutional law,[51] or in direct contravention of a law regulating the matter,[52] or where the county commissioners have fraudulently canvassed the votes cast in a county seat election, and have purposely declared the result improperly.[53] Of course no injunction will be granted when the removal is regular,[54] or, it has been held, for mere error committed by the commissioners in the exercise of their discretion.[55]

The suit must be brought by one who will be damaged by such removal.[56] It is generally held that a resident taxpayer has sufficient interest to bring the suit;[57] but there is authority to the contrary.[58] The removal of the county seat in accordance with the vote of the people may be compelled at the suit of a citizen and taxpayer.[59]

§ 111. Municipalities and Municipal Officers

Injunction will lie against a municipality or municipal officers to restrain illegal acts resulting in irreparable injury to a complainant who has no other adequate remedy available.

Unlawful interference by a municipal corporation or municipal officers or agents with the property or property rights of an individual or of another corporation will be enjoined when irreparable injury is caused thereby.[60] On the other hand, a court of equity will not interfere with the exercise of discretionary powers on the part of a municipal corporation or its officers as long as the limits of those powers are not exceeded[61] and no fraud, malice, bad faith, or improper motives are shown,[62] for otherwise this would be an assumption by the court of the right to exercise the powers delegated only to the corporation or its officers.[63] As long as they have acted honestly, the fact that a mistake has been made in the exercise of this discretion,[64] or that the acts are hasty and ill-advised and not for the best interests of the inhabitants,[65] constitute no ground for an injunction; but in case of an abuse of discretion whereby property rights are or will be injuriously affected the acts of such officers may be enjoined.[66] It is only

Absence of statutory appeal

The fact that neither the rules of municipal civil service commission nor any statute authorizes an appeal to court from action of the commission does not prevent the court, in a proper action, from restraining such commission from fraudulent, capricious, and illegal action.—Coleman v. Interference by force

Where individuals are actually occupying a disputed area of land, the right to the use and possession of which is claimed by a municipal corporation, such municipal corporation is without justification in attempting to interfere by force with the established possession of the individuals in actual occupancy of the disputed area, since municipalities have no greater right to ignore orderly processes of law than have individuals.—City of Jacksonville v. However, it has been stated that it is not after the manner of the courts of equity to close their doors on allegations of excessive use of power, even in the face of other available remedies.—McGuinn v. City of High Point, 13 S.E.2d 48, 219 N.C. 56.

Administrative review
(1) The right of appeal to board of health from ruling of plumbing inspector unlawfully prohibiting installation of given appliances in building being erected does not provide complete and adequate remedy preventing resort to equity for injunction, as ruling of board, being ministerial or administrative, would not be reviewable by certiorari.—City Council of Augusta v. Loftis, 118 S.E. 666, 156 Ga. 77.

(2) Even though appeal to board of health from ruling of plumbing inspector unlawfully prohibiting installation of given appliances in building being erected, as authorized by ordinance, is necessary to exhaust available remedies and perfect right to resort to equity, the board's ruling, if adverse, is not judgment concluding appellant from suing for injunction.—City Council of Augusta v. Loftis, supra.

Complainant held not to have other adequate remedy
(1) Generally.

Iowa.—Zimmerman v. O'Meara, 245 N.W. 715, 215 Iowa 1140.

(2) A district attorney was without legal remedy and could maintain suit for injunction to restrain issuance of liquor licenses under allegedly unconstitutional statute where constitutional provision relied on, prohibiting legalization of saloons, provided no penalty for its violation.—Golden v. People ex rel. Baker, 74 P.2d 715, 101 Colo. 381.

Irregular proceedings by a building inspector must stand until set aside by a legal tribunal, and are not a basis for enjoining the inspector damages[75] or by mandamus,[76] or by certiorari.[77] Likewise, an injunction will not issue to restrain municipal officers in order to permit plaintiff to enjoy the advantage of a wrongful act on his part.[78]

As a general rule a municipality or municipal officers will not be enjoined from future action on the mere possibility that it or they may do an illegal act,[79] or from doing an act which the officer has no authority or duty to do and which he has not threatened to do.[80]

Compelling acts. Where there is doubt as to the power of a city to do an act, it will not be ordered to do it by mandatory injunction.[81] Likewise, although the performance of mere ministerial duties may be compelled,[82] as a general rule courts of equity will not compel a municipal officer to do his duty,[83] and, in any event, before a mandatory injunction will be issued, the right to, and necessity for, such an injunction must be clearly shown.[84] A mandatory injunction compelling a municipality to remove a completed public improvement has been denied on the ground that the rights of citizens may sometimes be abridged in the interests of the public welfare.[85]

Persons entitled to injunction. If the illegal acts of a municipal corporation are such as to increase taxation or violate public rights, any taxpayer,[86] or the state acting through its proper legal officers,[87] or another municipality whose rights have been infringed by the municipality sought to be enjoined,[88] may bring suit for an injunction; but where the interests of the state at large are not affected the state is not a proper party.[89]

§ 112. School Boards and Officers

While injunction will not, in the absence of an abuse of discretion, issue to control the acts of school boards and officers within the limits of the powers conferred on them, unlawful acts or acts beyond the scope of the pow-from proceeding with his duties.—Pappas v. Meyer, 130 A. 834, 98 N.J.Eq. 18.

Irregularities in performing valid public contract or authorized municipal function do not authorize injunction.—Ruark v. International Union of Operating Engineers, Local Union No. 37, 146 A. 797, 157 Md. 576.

Multiplicity of actions

Where city authorities threaten repeated acts of usurpation over complainants' land and threaten a continued interference with and destruction of complainants' business, the action of trespass does not afford a plain, complete, and adequate remedy at law because it might require a multiplicity of actions successfully to recover for the damage done.—City of Jacksonville v. Giller, 135 So. 549, 102 Fla. 92.

32 C.J. p 260 note 20.
However, it has been held that, assuming that an adequate remedy was afforded by mandamus, such fact presents no obstacle to the controversy being settled on its merits in an action for a mandatory injunction.—Bissey v. Marion, 178 P. 611, 991, 104 Kan. 311.

Nuisance

The owner of a wooden building constructed within a city fire limits in violation of an ordinance cannot restrain the city from demolishing the building regardless of the validity of the ordinance providing for such demolitions, since such building constitutes a nuisance, and equity will refuse any relief designed to perpetuate its maintenance.—Maguire v. School boards or school officers may be enjoined from acting beyond the scope of their powers or in violation of law where the remedy at law is inadequate.[90] The right to an injunction, however, must be clearly shown,[91] and the injunction should go no further than is necessary to preserve the rights assailed.[92] An injunction will not issue in the absence of a showing of some threatened injury from the acts complained of,[93] where there is an adequate remedy at law,[94] or where there is a remedy special-

Appeal to school authorities

Under some statutes resort must first be had to the school authorities before the courts will hear any complaint as to a matter belonging to the administration of the school laws, but such resort is not necessary before suing to enjoin a wrong which does not arise out of the administration of the school laws.—Warren v. Sanger Independent School Dist., 288 S.W. 159, 116 Tex. 183—Rocky Mount Independent School Dist. v. Jackson, Civ.App., 152 S.W.2d 400, error refused—Nacogdoches Independent School Dist. v. Validity of organization

If the action is for the purpose of determining the question of the validity of the organization of a school district, quo warranto is the proper remedy, and the question cannot be determined by injunction restraining the existing officers from exercising their proper functions.—Specht v. be wisely exercised.[2] As long as there is a substantial compliance with the law technical defects will be disregarded.[3] Especially will such acts not be interfered with by a court of equity where, in addition to the fact that the acts are not in excess of their authority, a special remedy is provided by appeal to the county superintendent.[4]

Restraining illegal appointment or employment or discharge. An injunction will issue at the instance of the taxpayers or patrons of a school to restrain the illegal appointment or employment of a teacher,[5] such as to restrain the employment of one who has no legal certificate or license,[6] or of one whom the voters of the district have regularly decided they do not desire.[7] Also a county superintendent may sue the directors of a school district to restrain them from illegally appointing a teacher not qualified to teach,[8] although there is authority to the contrary.[9] Where school authorities are given power to employ and discharge teachers, taxpayers cannot by injunction interfere with their exercise of such discretionary power.[10] Injunction will not lie in a suit by taxpayers to prevent a school board from paying a teacher who has entered into a valid contract to teach.[11] Taxpayers cannot maintain an injunction to restrain school authorities from breaking a contract with a teacher where they are deprived of no right to instruction for their children,[12] nor can they by the extraordinary remedy of injunction compel the school board to keep its present superintendent and enjoin it from engaging another in his place.[13] The question as to who is legally employed to teach a school cannot properly be determined in an action to restrain one who assumes to act as director, or a teacher employed by him, from interfering with the school,[14] unless the action is based on alleged fraud.[15]

A teacher cannot maintain a bill for injunction to prevent his own trial and dismissal,[16] but he may enjoin an attempted dismissal without the hearing to which he is entitled under the statute.[17] In the absence of a special statutory remedy,[18] where a teacher has a contract to teach the right may be protected by injunction to prevent the school board or trustees from contracting with another,[19] and

Where a school board informally employs a teacher and enters into a contract with her, and thereafter formally meets and approves the informal action, it amounts to a ratification of the employment of the teacher, and the court will not enjoin the board from carrying out such contract, especially where the teacher has entered on her work with the consent and acquiescence of the school board.—Beckman v. Proctor, supra.

to prevent a usurper from interfering with the teacher in the discharge of his or her duties.[20] In the absence of another adequate remedy provided by statute,[21] where school teachers or employees, after a certain number of years of service, are entitled to tenure, injunction is the proper remedy to restrain a school board wrongfully attempting to deprive such a teacher or employee of his position.[22]

§ 113. Highway Boards and Officers

Injunction will not issue to direct or control the acts of highway officers or boards within the scope of their authority, although unlawful acts beyond their authority may be enjoined.

Highway officers will not be enjoined from the commission of acts within the scope of their authority as fixed by valid statutes,[23] or from doing acts which the law makes it their duty to perform,[24] even though productive of irreparable injury.[25] Likewise no injunction will issue in case the injured person has an adequate remedy at law[26] where complainant fails to show irreparable injury to himself,[27] where the right to the injunction is doubtful,[28] or where the injury inflicted is slight or it is doubtful whether any injury at all has been sustained.[29] Mere apprehension of the commission of unauthorized acts by highway officers will not authorize the issuance of an injunction.[30] Also the right to an injunction may be precluded by complainant's acquiescence in the proceedings,[31] or by facts amounting to estoppel; but these facts must be clearly established.[32]

On the other hand, the acts of highway officers which are outside the scope of the authority conferred on them and productive of irreparable in-

Compliance with statutory procedure
Where tenure teacher and superintendent of schools in city, who had actual notice of school board's resolution fixing date for consideration and determination whether his indefinite contract with school should be terminated, failed, within the time allowed by statute, to make request for a hearing, and board, in compliance with statute, entered an order canceling the contract, teacher's failure to ask for hearing within statutory time was a "consent" that board might decide, without a hearing, whether there was sufficient ground for canceling the contract, decision of board was final, and superior court should not have enjoined board from interfering with his performance of his duties as superintendent and should not have expunged the record of the board's order canceling the contract.—Phillippe v. Axe, 38 N.E.2d 341, 219 Ind. 328.

To compel contract
An action for mandatory injunction was remedy available to teacher who had acquired a permanent tenure status, to compel trustee of school township to furnish her with a definite written contract, and to reinstate her as a teacher.—Watson v. jury will be enjoined;[33] and this rule has been applied in the case of the annexing of disputed territory to a road improvement district under a void statute,[34] or the improper removal of trees, walls, and fences on private property.[35]

In the absence of a clear showing of right thereto and necessity therefor, an interlocutory injunction against a highway board or officers will be refused.[36]

Matters of discretion. Except in the case of a showing of an abuse of discretion resulting in irreparable injury,[37] an injunction will not issue to restrain the acts of highway officers in respect of which they are vested with discretionary power;[38] and this is so however impolitic may be the law under which they were acting,[39] and although they may have been guilty of errors of judgment.[40]

Mixed questions of law and fact, decided by a local administrative highway body, are subject to judicial review in proceedings for an injunction, even though there has been no abuse of discretion.[41]

§ 114. Other Public Boards and Officers

Injunction will not be granted to restrain canal and drainage officers when they are acting in good faith within their statutory powers.

Acts of officers vested with the power of establishing, locating, constructing, improving, and repairing canals or drains, if illegal and not within the scope of their authority, and resulting in irreparable injury, will be enjoined;[42] and a mandatory injunction may be issued in a proper case to compel affirmative action by them.[43] On the other hand, the right to an injunction must appear clearly,[44] and an injunction will not be granted when they are acting in good faith and within their statutory powers,[45] or because of mere irregularities in the exercise of the power conferred.[46] The discretion vested in them will not be controlled except in a clear case of abuse thereof.[47] An injunction will not be granted where an adequate remedy is provided by statute.[48]

d. Compelling performance of duties
e. Initiative and referendum elections

a. In General

As a general rule, injunction will not issue to control the actions of election officers in the performance of their duties, although illegal acts preliminary to an election may, in a number of jurisdictions, be restrained.

As a general rule, a court of equity is without jurisdiction to control by injunction election officers in the exercise of their statutory authority with respect to political elections,[49] at least at the suit of a taxpayer who shows no special injury peculiar to himself;[50] and this rule is applicable alike to general and primary elections.[51] An injunction will not issue for the purpose of directing or controlling the mode in, or of determining the rules of law in pursuance of, which an election shall be held.[52] It is particularly true that courts will not by injunction interfere with election officers in the performance of their duties where complainant has another adequate remedy,[53] where there has not been a compliance with statutory prerequisites to the bringing of such a suit,[54] where the case has become moot,[55] or where the issuance of the injunction will deprive the public of the right to vote in a general election.[56]

Absentee ballots

(1) Under a statute providing that the board of elections shall determine whether the duties, occupation, or business of the applicant for an absentee ballot, as set forth in his affidavit, are of a nature ordinarily to require absence from the state or county, and shall determine, if they are not found to be of such a nature, whether the special circumstances, as set forth in the affidavit, are sufficient, the board will not be restrained from delivering absentee ballots to registrants where the board has not made the required determination, notwithstanding the required affidavits and applications may be insufficient.—Application to Strike from Registry of Electors for Second Election District of Town of Nassau, Rensselaer County, Names of Certain Registrants, 15 N.Y.S.2d 352, 257 App.Div. 683.

(2) Injunction would not lie to restrain casting of absent voters' ballots by inmates of county home, notwithstanding inmates would be in county on election day and able to go to polls, and applications for ballots had been brought to county home and there signed up in a wholesale manner at instigation of persons other than the inmates, where legislature had provided a plain, speedy, and adequate procedure for challenging absent voters' ballots.—Drennen v. Registration officers or boards cannot be enjoined from performing the duties prescribed by the registration laws on the ground that such laws are unconstitutional and will deprive complainant and other citizens similarly situated of their right to vote.[57] Although it has been held that registration officers cannot be enjoined from performing the prescribed duties of their office in an irregular, fraudulent, or corrupt manner resulting in the denial of the right to register,[58] it has also been held that, where fraud or other palpable violation of the registration or election laws is charged prior to an election, an elector is entitled to relief by injunction.[59] A court of equity does not have jurisdiction to enjoin an election officer from certifying and having printed on the official ballot the names of duly nominated candidates to be voted for at a forthcoming election.[60] Although it has been held that injunction will not issue to restrain the placing of the name of a nominee on the ballot because of fraud in the primary election,[61] it has also been held that an injunction will issue to restrain election officers from certifying the name of a candidate to be placed on the election ballots where he is not entitled to have his name printed on such ballots,[62] and the certification of a person as nominee may be restrained pending the receipt of valid returns.[63] Injunction will lie after the election to restrain an illegal surrender of the ballots cast.[64]

b. Calling or Holding Election

Although in some jurisdictions the holding of a clearly illegal nonpolitical election may be enjoined, as a general rule injunction will not issue to restrain the calling or holding of an election.

Courts of equity ordinarily will not enjoin the calling of an election[65] at least unless fraud, corruption, oppression, or gross injustice is clearly shown.[66] However, it has been held that an injunction may be granted at the suit of the state to restrain the calling of an election for which the law makes no provision,[67] especially where the holding of such election would result in a waste of public funds,[68] or where the law under which it is proposed to be called is unconstitutional.[69] It has also been held that citizens and taxpayers have an equitable standing to enjoin by injunction the calling of an election, where there has not been a compliance with statutory conditions precedent to the calling of such an election,[70] or where the proposed constitutional amendment, if adopted, would be invalid.[71] It has also been held that the ordering of a new election may be enjoined until the result of one just held has been determined, where the announced result shows a tie, and there are allegations of fraud.[72]

Holding election in general. An injunction does not lie to restrain the holding of a public election authorized by law and properly called.[73] Mere conjectures as to the difficulties which may arise as a result of the election do not furnish justification for a restraint of the proposed election.[74]

Holding illegal or unauthorized election. Although there is authority to the contrary,[75] the general rule is that an injunction will not issue to prevent the holding of an election whether or not the election is illegal,[76] and that this is so whether the election relates to the filling of public office or other matters, such as changes in boundaries of political subdivisions and kindred matters.[77] Among others,[78] the reasons assigned for this view are that there is an adequate remedy at law,[79] by quo warranto,[80] and that the right involved is a strictly political right which cannot be enforced or protected by a court of equity but is cognizable only by a court of law.[81] Also injunctions have been denied in some cases by reason of the peculiar conditions which attended them, as, for instance, where it appeared to be probable that more harm would be done than prevented by granting the injunction prayed for,[82] or where it was apparent that the election would be of no possible benefit to anyone but would probably work irreparable injury to some, particularly if the acts complained of would have a tendency to prevent the construction of works in which the public had an interest.[83]

In some jurisdictions a distinction is drawn between a purely political election and one in which a public office is not involved; in such jurisdictions a purely political election cannot be enjoined.[84] Where, however, the election is not one in which a public office is involved and the election is without authority of law and would be void and cause unnecessary and improper expense, a taxpayer or other person who will be injured thereby is entitled to an injunction.[85] A court of equity is not bound

"An election held in violation of law or contrary to well-established legal requirements, or when it would result in substantial injury to any suitor or the public generally, may on proper showing be enjoined where there is no other legal reme-

to speculate on the likely or probable result of the election if held, but may enjoin the holding of it in a clear case,[86] and the fact that the validity of a wholly unauthorized election may be tested by other proceedings after the election is not an adequate remedy at law.[87] A statute forbidding courts of equity to entertain jurisdiction of election contests does not preclude a court of equity from enjoining an election wholly unauthorized by law.[88]

c. Canvass of Votes, Declaration of Result, and Giving of Certificate of Election

As a general rule election officers will not be restrained from canvassing the vote, declaring the result, and giving a certificate of election.

While there is some authority apparently to the contrary,[89] it has generally been held that election officers will not be restrained from canvassing the vote and declaring the result,[90] even though there was fraud and illegality in the election,[91] or although the statute under which the election officers acted was unconstitutional and void.[92] Especially should an injunction be denied where a special remedy is provided by law for testing the validity of the particular election complained of.[93]

Even where complainant's property or pecuniary rights would be affected by the canvass and declaration of the result, some decisions have held that the rule applies;[94] but other decisions limit the rule and allow an injunction in such cases,[95] at least where the election is nonpolitical.[96]

An exception to the rule has been recognized where the constitutional rights of a citizen, a taxpayer, are sought to be invaded by an attempt to make an unconstitutional or inapplicable law operative through the means of a popular election.[97]

Certificate of election. Election officers will not be enjoined from giving a certificate of election to the successful candidate,[98] and the fact that there was fraud in the election sufficient to vitiate it,[99] or that the election was held under a void statute,[1]

Where the election is called for the purpose of voting on whether certain parts of a county shall be detached therefrom and formed into a new county, and it is alleged that the detachment of the territory described is prohibited by express law, and the election would involve an expenditure of public funds, equity has jurisdiction to enjoin the election.—Gulick v. Linn, 216 P. 460, 90 Okl. 201.

does not affect the operation of the rule. The right to hold office cannot be tried in a suit to enjoin certification of an election, the remedy being by quo warranto.[2]

Who may institute proceedings. A statute authorizing the attorney general to bring an action in the name of the state to restrain a corporation from exercising any franchise or privilege not authorized by its charter does not authorize him to bring an action to enjoin a mayor and common council from recounting votes at a referendum election on the question of license, but he may bring such action only on request of the governor or one branch of the legislature as is provided in other cases.[3]

d. Compelling Performance of Duties

Where there is no other adequate remedy available, election officers may be compelled by injunction to perform their ministerial duties.

While mandamus is the usual remedy to compel officers charged with the conduct of elections and with the ascertainment and promulgation of the results thereof to perform the specific ministerial duties imposed on them by the law, and while injunction will be refused where such remedy is adequate,[4] it has been held that an injunction will lie to compel the performance of these ministerial duties where mandamus would be too slow to afford adequate relief or would for other reasons be an inadequate remedy,[5] and some decisions seem to hold without qualification that an injunction will lie to compel the performance of these duties.[6] On the other hand, in matters within their discretion their action cannot be controlled by injunction.[7] Election officers will not be compelled by injunction to perform acts not authorized by law.[8] Election officers will not be required by injunction to place the name of a particular party and its candidates on the ballot when, due to the proximity of the date of the election, to do so would deprive the voters of an opportunity to vote.[9]

e. Initiative and Referendum Elections

It is generally held that injunction will issue to restrain the holding of an election on an initiative or referendum proposal which, if enacted, would be invalid.

Generally an injunction will issue to restrain the holding of an election under an initiative or referendum act where there is no authority for calling it or where the measure, if enacted, would be invalid, and where the holding of it would result in a waste of public funds;[10] but, where the expense incurred would be but a trifling sum, equity may refuse to enjoin the submission on the ground that it would result in an illegal expenditure of the taxpayers' money.[11] A referendum may be enjoined where the petition for a referendum is in-

No objection
Where action involving plaintiff's right to election certificate was brought, and no special objections were made to form of remedy, mandatory injunction was permissible to compel board of elections to perform mandatory duty.—Board of Elections of Montgomery County v. Henry, 158 N.E. 94, 25 Ohio App. 278.

However, it has been held that, where an initiative petition is in proper form, the court cannot enjoin the secretary of state from certifying it and causing the ballot title and numbers to be printed on the official ballot on the ground that the bill, if enacted, would be unconstitutional.—State v. Kozer, 270 P. 613, 126 Or. 641—59 C.J. p 715 note 59.
No enacting clause
The submission of proposed initiative measure to voters was properly enjoined where measure, if adopted, would be invalid by reason of omission of an enacting clause therein.—Caine v. Robbins, 131 P.2d 516, 61 Nev. 416.

sufficient[12] or vitiated by fraud,[13] and the secretary of state may be enjoined from putting on the ballot a referendum not authorized by law.[14] On the filing of a petition for a referendum, action on the part of administrative officials may be enforced or restrained so as to obtain a proper submission of the questions raised by the petition.[15] Where it appears at any stage of a proceeding to restrain the placing of an initiative measure on the ballot that the real object of the person invoking the aid of the court is the perpetration of fraud, the court, of its own motion, will deny him relief.[16]

At whose instance. Ordinarily the remedies are available at the instance of any citizen and taxpayer.[17] The prosecuting attorney of a county in which are located the offices of the attorney general, the secretary of state, and the state capitol cannot, by virtue of his office, maintain an action to enjoin such officials from filing a petition for a referendum on a general act.[18] On the other hand, a suit to enjoin the secretary of state, under some statutes, from certifying and printing an initiative measure on the official ballot must be brought in the name of the state by duly authorized officers.[19]

§ 116. Appointment or Removal of Officers

As a general rule equity has no jurisdiction to enjoin the appointment or removal of public officers.

While injunctions have been granted to prevent the improper removal of an officer where there was no doubt as to the illegality of the action and where the removal had not already taken place but was threatened,[20] the general rule, in the absence of statute providing otherwise, is that equity has no jurisdiction to enjoin the appointment or removal of public officers, whether the power of appointment or removal is vested in executive or administrative boards or officers or is intrusted to a judicial tribunal.[21] Likewise, although it has been held that a court of equity may order an officer's reinstate-

Ohio.—Spahr v. Brown, 19 Ohio App. 107.

At next regular election
The court may enjoin submission of a matter at the next regular election in a suit seeking such injunction on the grounds of insufficiency of the petition; but if such election is not permanently enjoined it should be had at the regular election, or as soon as may be under the law, awaiting the final decision of the court.—Barkley v. Pool, 169 N.W. 730, 732, 102 Neb. 799—59 C. J. p 714 note 36.

Procedural errors
The injunctive procedure authorized by a statute providing that, on showing that any petition filed is not legally sufficient, the court may enjoin the certifying or printing of such measure on the official ballot will not reach substantive defects in the proposed enactment, but is preliminary and goes only to procedural errors in proposing it.—State v. Burns, Mo., 172 S.W.2d 259.

13. Concealed mutilation, separation, or alteration of sections of petition for initiated amendment of constitution will warrant equitable relief by suit to enjoin secretary of state from placing question on ballot, pursuant to petition.—Elkins v. Milliken, 249 P. 655, 80 Colo. 135.

Protest inadequate
(1) Where the secretary of state is without power to summon witnesses or to compel them to testify, the right to protest before the secretary is not an adequate remedy at law.—Elkins v. Milliken, supra.

(2) Since such a protest is an inadequate remedy, the fact that a protest is pending does not constitute another suit pending so as to preclude the issuance of an injunction.—Elkins v. Milliken, supra.

Specification of protested names
In suit to enjoin secretary of state from placing question of repeal of constitutional section on election ballot pursuant to petition for initiated amendment, objection that protested names on petition were not specified held not available, Comp.L. § 31 being inapplicable to such suit.—Elkins v. ment after he has been unlawfully removed,[22] it has also been held that as a court of equity has no power to prevent an illegal removal, it cannot by mandatory injunction compel the reinstatement of a person who has been illegally removed.[23] Furthermore a board of officers will not be restrained from hearing and acting on charges against an officer, on the ground that it is prejudiced and will proceed illegally.[24] On the other hand, although injunction is not the appropriate remedy to try the title to the office,[25] equity will interfere on behalf of an officer de facto, claiming to be the officer de jure, to prevent another, especially an intruder, from wresting the office from him without process of law.[26] In order to enjoin an appointee to office from qualifying and the county clerk from accepting the qualification, it must be made very clear that the clerk is transcending his duties and that the appointee's title to the office is spurious.[27] Persons who have not been legally employed as public employees cannot resist injunctive proceedings against them to prevent their interfering with the proper employees on the ground that they are de facto public officers and that they can be removed only by quo warranto proceedings.[28]

Effect of civil service rules. In the application of the general rule that equity has no jurisdiction to enjoin the appointment or removal of public officers, it is immaterial that the appointee is within the protection of the civil service rules.[29] It has been held, however, that, although where a civil service employee is discharged for cause, either in conformity with the civil service procedure or in violation of it, he has no cause for injunctive relief,[30] equity can enjoin illegal removal of civil service employees.[31] Injunction is available, if necessary, to secure for a discharged civil service employee a hearing on his appeal.[32] To entitle a person to injunctive relief to compel the civil service commission to make an appointment, the right to such relief must be clear.[33] A court will not order the continuance in employment of provisional employees and enjoin the civil service commission from dismissing them from their positions.[34]

Discharged deputy
(1) In sheriff's suit to enjoin discharged deputy from performing duties of office, deputy's possession of official property was only incidentally involved and hence court could order deputy to turn over keys and official papers, irrespective of adequacy of sheriff's legal remedies to recover possession and of statute prohibiting purely mandatory injunction.—Denson v. Tarver, 197 S.E. 242, 186 Ga. 180.

(2) Enjoining a discharged deputy sheriff from further seeking to perform functions of the office was not error, where evidence indicated that deputy had refused to recognize sheriff's authority to discharge him, notwithstanding deputy had turned over keys and papers at the time of the interlocutory hearing, since even an expressed abandonment of deputy's illegal course of action would not necessarily preclude injunction. —Denson v. § 118. Enactment or Publication of Ordinances or Resolutions

As a general rule injunction will not issue to restrain the enactment or publication of ordinances or resolutions.

The general rule is that a municipal corporation, in the exercise of legislative power with relation to the subjects committed to its jurisdiction, can no more be enjoined than can the legislature of the state.[35] The restraining power of the court should be directed against the enforcement rather than the passage of orders and resolutions or ordinances by municipal corporations.[36]

There are exceptions, however, to this doctrine of noninterference, as where the mere passage of the ordinance would immediately occasion, or would be followed by, some irreparable loss or injury beyond the power of redress by subsequent judicial proceedings, or where it would cause a multiplicity of suits.[37] So a distinction has been drawn between a case in which the municipality is acting in its governmental or public character with discretionary authority and one in which it is acting as the owner of property.[38] Furthermore, if the ordinance, the passing of which is sought to be enjoined, is not within the legislative discretion of the municipal body, there is no question as to the jurisdiction to grant an injunction.[39] Under ordinary circumstances the passing of an ordinance will not be enjoined on the ground that its enforcement will violate the obligation of a prior contract.[40]

An injunction will not issue to prevent the passing of an unconstitutional or otherwise void ordinance where it will not result in any irreparable injury.[41] Moreover, the injury threatened must be impending as a direct result of the voting on, and passing of, the ordinance as distinguished from injury that may result from the carrying out or enforcement of the ordinance.[42] Where it is the enforcement of the ordinance that will cause the injury it is the enforcement that must be enjoined.[43] Residents of a parish, but not within the limits of a municipality therein, having no property interest therein, have no right to an injunction restraining the citizens of the town from enacting ordinances touching local option and holding elections in the town.[44]

Publication. Where an ordinance has been passed by the council and approved by the mayor and nothing remains to be done to render it immediately effective except publication, which is merely a ministerial act, the court may on a proper showing enjoin the publication thereof.[45] However, it has

§ 119. Enforcement of Statutes, Ordinances, or Other Regulations

Injunction will lie to restrain the enforcement of an unconstitutional or invalid statute or ordinance on the complaint of one whose property rights will be irreparably injured thereby and who has no other available remedy.

An injunction is proper to restrain a public officer or municipality from acting under an unconstitutional or otherwise invalid statute[48] or ordi-

Injunction by federal court against enforcement of state statutes see Federal Courts § 50.

A wrong attempted by an officer under color of a void statute will be enjoined as readily as one attempted by a private person in violation of law and without color of office provided sufficient ground for injunction under the rules and principles governing the subject are shown, as where acts of either are trespasses. —Coal & Coke R. Co. v. Conley, 67 S.E. 613, 67 W.Va. 129.

In name of state

Even if the name of the state is used to enforce such a statute, it is, nevertheless, a proceeding without authority which does not affect the state in its sovereign or governmental capacity.—Young v. Rafferty, 33 Philippines 556.

Time governing

In a suit to enjoin enforcement of an ordinance prohibiting commercial advertising on the exterior of street cars, the transit company was held to be empowered under its articles or franchises to engage in the advertising business, although its original articles gave no such power where it was given by an amendment of articles after the commencement of the suit, since it is the state of things as of the trial, rather than of the commencement of the action, which governs.—Pacific Rys. Advertising Co. v. City of Oakland, 276 P. 629, 98 Cal.App. 165.

Multiplicity of suits held not threatened so as to warrant issuance of injunction.—Erie R. Co. v. Village of Elmira Heights, 211 N.Y.S. 688, 125 Misc. 441.

51. Ill.—Kearney v. Canton, 113 N. E. 98, 273 Ill. 507—Klever Shampay Karpet Kleaners v. City of Chicago, 238 Ill.App. 291.

"Courts of equity are reluctant to take jurisdiction of a case to enjoin the enforcement of a municipal ordinance on a matter on which the municipality has the power to legislate, and will not do so to prevent a multiplicity of suits unless the ordinance actually affects a right or interest common to a large number of complainants."—Moy v. City of Chicago, 140 N.E. 845, 847, 309 Ill. 242.

Subject to arrest

The fact that each of plaintiffs may be subject to arrest for violation of the ordinance has been held not to entitle them to maintain injunctive proceedings against the enforcement of the ordinance on the ground that they are threatened with a multiplicity of suits.—Oklahoma City v. Norton-Johnson Buick Motor Co., 36 P.2d 278, 169 Okl. 179.

32 C.J. p 244 note 83.

Killing dogs

An injunction was proper remedy to prevent enforcement of order of selectmen of town prohibiting plaintiffs from harboring more than a certain number of dogs within the town, where plaintiffs were maintaining a licensed kennel, and plaintiffs' failure to obey order might result in killing of valuable dogs, and plaintiffs had no right of appeal from order and unless its enforcement were enjoined, dogs might be killed before validity of order could be otherwise tested.—Scudder v. Town of Greenwich, 14 A.2d 728, 127 Conn. 71.

32 C.J. p 244 note 90.

55. Last practicable moment

It has also been held that, instead of interfering with a legislative movement to the accomplishment of an illegal purpose, at the outset thereof, the court should rather act at the last practicable moment, giving ample time for appeals to be made to the reason and good judgment of the legislators.—Gray v. Wilmington, 83 A. 321, 10 Del.Ch. 39—32 C.J. p 265 note 66.

Ill.—Schlosser's Bakeries v. Village of Oak Park, 41 N.E.2d 234, 314 Ill. App. 386.

the statute[57] or ordinance[58] must be clearly established. The mere fact that a statute[59] or ordinance[60] is unconstitutional or void is not alone sufficient ground for enjoining its enforcement; other circumstances bringing the case under some recognized head of equity jurisdiction must be shown.[61]

Inequitable advantage

Equity will not enjoin the enforcement of an invalid ordinance to enable plaintiff to obtain an inequitable advantage over others.—Marrs v. City of Oxford, C.C.A.Kan., 32 F.2d 134, 67 A.L.R. 1336, affirming, D.C., 24 F.2d 541, and certiorari denied Ramsey v. City of Oxford, 50 S.Ct. 24, 280 U.S. 563, 74 L.Ed. 617, and Marrs v. City of Oxford, 50 S.Ct. 29, 280 U.S. 573, 74 L.Ed. 625.

No benefit to plaintiff

A colored teacher was not entitled to injunction enjoining enforcement of allegedly discriminatory Maryland statutes relating to salaries for white and colored teachers where real objective of suit was to tie up equalization fund and prevent its distribution to counties as beneficiaries, since injunction would not directly benefit teacher and would be detrimental to elementary school education in counties participating in fund.—Mills v. Lowndes, D.C.Md., 26 F.Supp. 792.

Confiscatory ordinance

It has been held that an injunction against the enforcement of an ordinance on the ground that it is confiscatory will not be granted where on the evidence there is no certainty that the rates prescribed will necessarily be confiscatory; but if it shall thereafter appear that under the actual operation of the ordinance the returns allowed by it are confiscatory, nothing in the judgment denying the application for injunction will prevent another application for an injunction.—City of Knoxville v. Knoxville Water Co., Tenn., 29 S.Ct. 148, 212 U.S. 1, 53 L.Ed. 371.

Minor provisions

Where injunction against zoning ordinance is sought on broad ground that ordinance adversely affects plaintiff, court will not examine ordinance to determine constitutionality of minor provisions.—Village of Euclid, Ohio, v. Ambler Realty Co., Ohio, 47 S.Ct. 114, 272 U.S. 365, 71 L.Ed. 303, 54 A.L.R. 1016, reversing, D.C., Ambler Realty Co. v. Village of Euclid, Ohio, 297 F. 307.

Not judicial controversy

To enjoin officials of the executive department of the government from executing an act of congress asserted to be unconstitutional, in absence of injury sustained or immediately threatened, would not be to decide a judicial controversy, but to assume a position of authority over the governmental acts of another department.—Commonwealth of Massachusetts v. Mellon, 43 S.Ct. 597, 262 U.S. 447, 67 L.Ed. 1078, affirming Frothingham v. Mellon, 288 F. 252, 53 App.D.C. 47.

Police regulation

The cases wherein the courts may by injunction prevent the execution or enforcement of a police regulation of a municipal corporation are extraordinary ones, where the legislative body has exceeded or grossly abused its authority and has invaded an individual's vested or fundamental right or immunity.—Keegan v. Board of Com'rs of Port of New Orleans, 98 So. 50, 154 La. 639.

Violation of legal right

To be in a position to attack a statute or an order by injunction suit as invalid, it is not sufficient that complaining party show damage to himself but, in addition, he must show a violation of his legal right by the statute or order which is attacked.—U. Anticipation of invalid action

Resort to injunction against allegedly unconstitutional statute may not be had merely because of anticipation of invalid action in administration.—S. Buchsbaum & Co. v. Beman, D.C.Ill., 14 F.Supp. 444.

Heavy penalty

The injury which flows from the threat of enforcement of an unconstitutional, regulatory statute with penalties so heavy as to forbid the risk of challenge in proceedings to enforce it constitutes irreparable injury.—Petroleum Exploration v. Public Service Commission of Kentucky, Ky., 58 S.Ct. 834, 304 U.S. 209, 82 L.Ed. 1294, affirming, D.C., 21 F. Supp. 254, motion denied 58 S.Ct. 527.

Mere inconvenience and expense and apprehension of injury to property rights or mere general allegations of irreparable injury and deprivation of property rights will not give equity jurisdiction to enjoin the enforcement of a penal statute.—Walnut Transfer & Storage Co. v. Harrison, 196 S.E. 432, 185 Ga. 720.

Individual damage

In single suit by sponge fishermen, each of whom operated as an individual, to restrain enforcement of Florida criminal statute prohibiting use of diving equipment by sponge fishermen, each fisherman must rely on his own cause of action and must show individual irreparable damage.—Pope v. Taxpayers, however, have sufficient interest to maintain a suit to enjoin action by public officers under an invalid law which will affect the property of the state or the amount of taxes to be paid.—McCullough v. Brown, 19 S.E. 458, 41 S.C. 220, 23 L.R.A. 410—32 C.J. p 245 note 1.

Proceedings to enforce

Where the validity of laws or administrative orders under them may be fully contested in proceedings brought by the administrative officers to enforce them, such proceedings offer an adequate legal remedy, and a bill to enjoin the administrative authorities from taking steps to enforce such orders will not lie.—McDermott v. Bradford, D.C. Wash., 10 F.Supp. 661.

Requests for permits

(1) Where it would be idle to make a request for a permit under the statute or ordinance alleged to be invalid, a request for such a permit is not a condition precedent to a suit to enjoin enforcement.—Van Gammeren v. City of Fresno, 124 P. 2d 621, 51 Cal.App.2d 235—Laura Vincent Co. v. City of Selma, 111 P. 2d 17, 43 Cal.App.2d 473.

(2) Where the owner of a building contends that an ordinance is inapplicable to him and sues to enjoin enforcement as to him, he need not, as a condition to bringing suit, have requested a permit under the ordinance.—Illinois Life Ins. Co. v. City of Chicago, 244 Ill.App. 185.

(3) Where, however, a zoning ordinance provides for appeals from a grant or refusal of a zoning permit, a property owner must exhaust that remedy before he can enjoin the enforcement of the ordinance, at least in the absence of an attack on the ordinance in its entirety.—Central Trust Co. v. City of Cincinnati, 23 N.E.2d 450, 62 Ohio App. 139.

A creditor of a city whose rights are impaired by an issue of bonds under an unconstitutional statute may sue.—Smith v. Appleton, 19 Wis. 468.

Annoyance and embarrassment

A naturalized citizen could not maintain suit to enjoin enforcement of state statute requiring registration of alien on the ground that he had a foreign appearance, spoke broken English, and was likely to suffer annoyance and embarrassment from attempts to enforce the statute against him in the belief that he was an alien.—Davidowitz v. Hines, D.C.Pa., 30 F.Supp. 470, affirming Hines v. Davidowitz, 61 S.Ct. 399, 312 U.S. 52, 85 L.Ed. 581.

A stockholder in a bank, who may become liable personally, may sue to restrain the collection of taxes against the bank under an invalid law.—Markoe v. Hartranft, 15 Am. L.Reg. 487.

Plaintiff held entitled to maintain suit

(1) Generally.

Ill.—Ehrlich v. Village of Wilmette, 197 N.E. 567, 361 Ill. 213.

Wis.—Wadhams Oil Co. v. City of Delavan, 243 N.W. 224, 208 Wis. 578.

(2) One who purchases land after the enactment of an invalid ordinance affecting such land has a right to maintain an action to enjoin the enforcement of such ordinance.—Continental Oil Co. v. City of Twin Falls, 286 P. 353, 49 Idaho 89, followed in Independent School Dist. No. 1 of Twin Falls County v. Continental Oil Co., 286 P. 360, 49 Idaho 109.

(3) Owner of premises leased to another could sue to enjoin enforcement of zoning ordinance as against the danger to plaintiff's property is not imminent,[67] where there is nothing to show that the officer or municipality proposes to put the statute or ordinance into execution or to do anything about it,[68] or where, if property rights are involved, there is no showing that they will be injured by the enforcement of the statute.[69]

If a statute or ordinance as a whole is invalid, an injunction restraining its enforcement may be issued although no action has been taken to enforce it, at least where the act itself constitutes a threat against plaintiff's property, against which he is entitled to relief.[70] Where, however, the act in its general features and purposes is valid, and only some subordinate and interior feature of it is in question, an injunction will not issue against those features, even if generally invalid, until they are sought to be applied against plaintiff.[71] It is no objection to a bill to restrain the enforcement of an unconstitutional statute that the act is not void on its face, but is complained of only because its operation in the particular instance works a violation of a constitutional right.[72] Where the ordinance is void in part only, the enforcement of the part that is void may be enjoined.[73]

objection that owner was not "real party in interest."—Knickerbocker Ice Co. v. Sprague, D.C.N.Y., 4 F. Supp. 499.

(4) In suit to restrain enforcement of zoning ordinance, plaintiff, who had not assigned or defaulted on his contract to purchase realty zoned for residence purposes, was "real party in interest," notwithstanding he had contracted with third person for sale of realty and erection of filling station, where contract with third person was conditioned on plaintiff's obtaining change in zoning.—Weber v. City of Cheyenne, 97 P.2d 667, 55 Wyo. 202.

Right of disposal

If the enforcement of an unconstitutional statute or ordinance will deprive the owner of land of his right to dispose of it for lawful purposes, it constitutes an unlawful restriction on his property rights.—Boothby v. City of Westbrook, 23 A.2d 316, 138 Me. 117.

Tex.—Bielecki v. City of Port Arthur, Civ.App., 2 S.W.2d 1001, reversed on other grounds, Com. App., 12 S.W.2d 976.

Before effective date

Court will not enjoin enforcement of ordinance before time provided for ordinance to become effective.—Bagby v. Bowen, 178 S.E. 439, 180 Ga. 214.

Complainant held entitled to maintain suit where license commissioners notified him that his license would not be renewed unless he complied with the allegedly unconstitutional act.—C. Tisdall Co. v. Board of Aldermen of City of Newport, 188 A. 648, 57 R.I. 96.

Segregation ordinance

Enforcement of segregation ordinance preventing occupancy of lot by colored person in block where majority of residences were occupied by white persons should be enjoined if ordinance was invalid, in view of written notice of intention to enforce ordinance, proceedings to such end, and provisions constituting each day's continued occupancy as prohibited, separate offense.—Allen v. Oklahoma City, 52 P.2d 1054, 175 Okl. 421, followed in Scott v. Watt, 52 P.2d 1059, 175 Okl. 426, Ex parte Lee, 52 P.2d 1059, 175 Okl. 426, and Ex parte Hawkins, 52 P.2d 1059, 175 Okl. 425.

Tax statute

Injunction cannot be obtained against operation of statute, especially statute levying taxes, not yet enforced against petitioners.—Standard Cigar Co. v. Doyal, 166 S.E. 434, 175 Ga. 857.

Tex.—Davis v. City of Houston, Civ. App., 264 S.W. 625.

Bare threat

(1) Injunction will not issue to prevent the consummation of a bare threat which, if followed up by an overt act, would work irreparable injury.—West v. Chastain, 198 S.E. 736, 186 Ga. 667.

(2) It has also been held, however, that a threat to enforce a regulation constituting an unlawful restriction on property rights may be enjoined.—Boothby v. City of Westbrook, 23 A.2d 316, 138 Me. 117.

In advance of any act

Provision of an ordinance providing for police inspection of social clubs required to obtain licenses may not in an injunction action be complained of in advance of any act of inspection because of what might be done under it.—Slovanian Literary & Social Ass'n v. City of Portland, 224 P. 1098, 111 Or. 335.

Remission of taxes

A court will not enjoin the enforcement of a provision of an occupational tax ordinance permitting the council to remit all or part of the tax in the absence of a showing of any effort to remit any tax.—Rogers v. City of Rogers, 295 S.W. 708, 174 Ark. 486.

Jurisdiction not exercised

It has been held that the court should as a rule decline to exercise jurisdiction, although having it, to enjoin public officers from executing the legislative will as to some one or more minor features of a law not essential to the efficacy of its dominant legislative features.—Wadhams Oil Co. v. Tracy, 123 N.W. 785, 141 Wis. 150, 18 Ann.Cas. 779.

73. Tenn.—Ignaz v. Knoxville, 1 Tenn.Ch.A. 1.

A zoning ordinance may be valid in its general aspects, yet as to a particular state of facts involving a particular parcel of realty affected thereby be so clearly arbitrary and unreasonable as to result in confiscation, thereby justifying the interposition of a court of equity to restrain enforcement of the ordi-

nicipality is within its charter powers, and raises mere questions of expediency, the decision of which is within the discretion of the municipal body, no injunction will be granted.[74] Courts cannot restrain the enforcement of an ordinance which is within the constitutional limitations of the municipality which enacted it;[75] nor can they restrain the enforcement thereof merely because they may not agree with the legislative body enacting the ordinance in the wisdom or propriety thereof.[76] The fact that an ordinance otherwise valid will inflict some hardship on individuals constitutes no ground for restraining its enforcement.[77] Where a valid ordinance requires a license or permit as a prerequisite to carrying on a certain business, the enforcement of the ordinance will not be enjoined where no application has been made for a permit,[78] or merely because the license is wrongfully withheld.[79] A statute providing that an injunction cannot be granted to prevent the execution of a public statute, by officers of the law, for the public benefit includes valid municipal ordinances.[80]

Temporary injunction. Where a strong showing of the invalidity of a statute or ordinance is made[81] a temporary injunction may be issued to restrain enforcement thereof pending trial,[82] particularly where it is clear that greater injury would be done by refusing such injunction than by granting it,[83] as where such enforcement pendente lite might result in the imposition of enormous penalties, or the forfeiture of valuable property rights, for which no redress could be later had for the injury done.[84] Where the constitutionality of the statute depends on controverted facts and can be determined only on a hearing, the court may suspend the operation of the statute in a proper case, to prevent irreparable injury, until the final hearing.[85] A temporary injunction will be granted enjoining a municipality from enforcing an ordinance of doubtful validity where serious inconvenience to the traveling public and serious damage to the business interests of the city may otherwise result.[86] On the other hand,

Notice

A statute prohibiting issuance of a temporary injunction to restrain enforcement of an ordinance except on hearing after notice of time and place and copy of bill have been served on the municipality's executive officer twenty-four hours prior to hearing, was not unconstitutional as an invasion of judicial power or as violation of requirement that justice be administered without delay.—Rochell v. where it is not apparent that a restraining order is necessary,[87] or where irreparable injury will not result if a temporary injunction is denied,[88] a temporary injunction will not be issued. The writ will not issue where it is sought merely for the purpose of delay in the enforcement of a statute or administrative order promulgated under it,[89] nor should it be issued to suspend the operation of a valid statute.[90] Whether or not a sufficient showing has been made to warrant the issuance of a temporary injunction is a matter committed primarily to the discretion of the trial court.[91] The presumption that a statute is constitutional requires denial of temporary injunction against enforcement of such statute by a three-judge court except in extraordinary situations.[92]

§ 120. Unauthorized or Fraudulent Improvements or Contracts

In a suit by a taxpayer or other person having an interest entitling him to sue, public officers or boards may be enjoined from letting or carrying out unauthorized and illegal contracts for public improvements.

Equity has jurisdiction to prevent public officers and boards from letting or carrying out unauthorized and illegal contracts for public improvements.[93] On the other hand, the right to an injunction must be clearly shown,[94] and no injunction will issue where the acts sought to be enjoined are not contrary to law,[95] or where they are within the discretion of the officers and no fraud is charged,[96] or where it is established by competent evidence that the officers have no intention of doing the act which it is sought to enjoin.[97] It has also been held that, where the proposed contract would be void and no rights could be acquired under it, no injunction will be granted,[98] but there is also authority to the contrary.[99] To authorize an injunction, the threatened injury must be substantial and the illegality must amount to more than a mere irregularity when the object is proper and beneficial.[1]

Motives of complainant in seeking injunctive relief are not subject to inquiry if he has shown that he has the other qualifications to sue.[2]

Letting contracts to lowest bidders. Where the statute requires a contract to be let to the lowest bidder, the letting of it to one not the lowest bidder will be enjoined;[3] but not in case the matter is in the discretion of the officers sought to be enjoined,[4] unless fraud or its equivalent has been

Right to object
A court of equity is not without jurisdiction to declare that a city council had no power to enter into a certain contract, which would call for the levy of special assessments, and to issue an injunction, although the statute provides for objections and hearings before the council.—Gantenbein v. practiced,[5] or where ratification by the municipality is required before the contract is made.[6]

Who may sue. Injunction will not be granted unless complainant's right to bring the suit is clear.[7] It is generally proper for suit to be brought by the state through the attorney-general[8] or by a taxpayer.[9] A disappointed bidder for a contract, unless he is also a taxpayer,[10] is not the proper party to sue for an injunction.[11] To entitle a taxpayer or other person to sue for such an injunction he must show that he is interested in the matter and will be damaged if the improper acts are not prevented by injunction,[12] and that he has no other adequate remedy.[13]

To entitle him to the injunctive relief complainant must act promptly. He is not entitled to an injunction to stop a public improvement, on the ground that it is unauthorized, after the taxes have been levied for it and have been collected without objection.[14]

§ 121. —— Issue of Bond or Other Securities

An illegal issuance of bonds or other securities by a public officer may be enjoined.

When bonds or other evidences of indebtedness are about to be issued by public officers illegally or without complying with the statute authorizing their issue, equity has jurisdiction to grant an injunction,[15] and this is so, even though the issuing officers have no public money under their control.[16] Where the law requires that the question shall be submitted to popular vote, an issue of bonds without such a vote will be enjoined.[17] To authorize the issuance of an injunction it must be shown that the bond issue is actually contemplated[18] and is illegal,[19] and that complainant has no other adequate remedy.[20] Where the bonds would be utterly void, even in the hands of innocent third persons, no injunction will be granted, since complainant will suffer no injury.[21]

§ 122. Payment or Other Disposition of Public Funds

Where sought by a person occupying the proper status to maintain the suit, injunction is a proper remedy to restrain unlawful appropriation or disposition of public funds.

Public officers will not be restrained from the payment or other disposition of public funds where in so doing they are acting lawfully and within the authority vested in them.[22] On the other hand, in-

Bondholder
Where agreement between city and water conservation board provided that city was to obtain water supply from board, owner of bond issued by city to finance former water supply project was not entitled to enjoin city and board from entering into such contract where the net income which would be realized by city from water sales would be increased if agreement with water conservation board were carried out.—Farmers State Bank of Conrad v. Depreciation of property value
Injunction to restrain town from erecting incinerator and entering into contract for its construction was properly denied, where property owners merely stated that their property would depreciate and become unsuitable for residence purposes if incinerator was erected, and did not show that they had reasonable prospect of success in suit or that their damage would be irreparable if wrong complained of was permitted to continue.—Hudson v. Enjoining:

Calling of illegal election to avoid waste of public funds see supra § 115.
Illegal expenditure of highway funds see Highways § 176 i.

An unconstitutional statute is not law, and the appropriation of public funds thereunder is unlawful appropriation, which will be restrained.—McAlpine v. Dimick, 157 N.E. 235, 326 Ill. 240.

Funds for special use

(1) A writ of injunction will properly issue to restrain the diversion of public funds intrusted to public officers for special use.—Newman v. Biggs, Tex.Civ.App., 68 S.W.2d 632—Fletcher v. (2) Injunction, however, will not lie to require spending proceeds of bond issue on particular state highway project, where question submitted to voters did not require expenditure on particular project.—Moore v. Polsgrove, 293 S.W. 965, 219 Ky. 410.

(3) Constitutional authorization of suit by citizen to protect inhabitants of municipality against illegal exactions does not give chancery court jurisdiction to restrain issuance of salary vouchers and warrants to alleged de facto officer.—Davis v. Wilson, supra.

Preamble in proposed act reciting purposes of the act and containing argumentative statements of reason for its adoption was improper under laws providing for publication of such at the expense of the proponent, and the publication of such preamble at the expense of the state was enjoined.—State v. ficient remedy by quo warranto.[28] An injunction will not be granted where the payment or disposition is actually not illegal,[29] or is only technically illegal and should be made because value has been received for it;[30] or where the payment, although illegal, is made in settlement of a claim for which the municipality would be ultimately liable;[31] or where the propriety of the payment is merely doubtful;[32] or where, although the statute has been only partially complied with, no fact is shown which places the taxpayers in a different or worse position from that which they would have occupied if the orders for the payment of money on their face had been made in strict compliance with every detail of the statute.[33]

Who may sue. Before an injunction will issue to restrain payment or other disposition of public funds, complainant must show that he has such an interest in the public funds in question that he has the proper status to maintain the suit.[34]

Where a municipality is attempting to exceed the powers conferred on it by the state and is about to expend public money, the suit to restrain such expenditure may be brought in the name of the state or its attorney general.[35] So the municipality whose officers are about to make the illegal expenditure may sue for an injunction.[36] A city, as such, however, has no interest in money collected by its officers pursuant to state and county tax levies, and it cannot restrain its officers from paying over such funds to the state and county.[37]

As a general rule resident taxpayers are proper parties to sue for an injunction to prevent an illegal disposition of public funds, and it is not generally required that complainants show injury to themselves other than that which they must suffer in common with the public at large;[38] but some decisions hold that complainant must show a special injury to himself different from that suffered by the general public;[39] and in a few cases it has been required that the taxpayer should bring the suit, not for his own benefit alone, but also on behalf of all the other taxpayers, where he had no interest in the question to be determined other than that which arises from a liability to pay taxes.[40]

Where a creditor has an adequate remedy at law,[41] or where he can compel by mandamus the application of public funds to the payment of the debt,[42] an injunction is not the proper remedy to prevent the misapplication of such funds; and it has been held that an injunction can be awarded a creditor only as an adjunct to the remedy for the enforcement of the debt,[43] and that where plaintiff fails to establish his right to mandamus prayed for to compel payment of his debt, the remedy by injunction must fall with it;[44] that a creditor is not entitled to an injunction to prevent moneys from being paid out where they properly belong merely because other moneys which should have been paid to him have been wrongfully diverted elsewhere;[45] and that a creditor cannot avoid an alienation of property of the corporation on which he has no specific or general lien and which is not shown to be essential to the security of the corporate creditors.[46] A holder of bonds, for the payment of which taxes are levied and collected, is entitled to an injunction against the unlawful diversion of such funds to other purposes when such misapplication results in impairment of contracts or other justiciable injury,[47] and this is true whether or not the bonds are in default.[48] A creditor has been held to be entitled to a temporary injunction against the expenditure for other purposes of proceeds of bonds issued for the designated purpose from which his claim arises, where necessary to render his suit effectual.[49] Bondholders have been held not to be entitled to have the proceeds of the bonds impounded by injunction on the mere apprehension that, in a suit by taxpayers, the statute under which the bonds were issued may be declared invalid, at least where such apprehension does not appear to be well founded.[50]

To compel payment. An injunction should not issue against a public officer to compel him to make payment, or authorize payment, from public funds unless a clear right to such relief is shown.[51] A mandatory injunction to compel payment from public funds will not be issued where there is a complete and adequate remedy at law.[52] Where, however, the granting of a mandatory injunction is necessary to afford complainant a complete remedy,[53] or where the duty to make payment is so clear that the making of the payment is a mere ministerial act,[54] injunction may issue to compel payment. A mandatory injunction to rectify the unconstitutional application of money from taxes will not be granted when there is no lawful authority for applying it for any purpose whatever.[55]

F. PUBLIC WELFARE, PROPERTY, AND RIGHTS

§ 123. In General

Injunction is a proper remedy to protect the rights and welfare of the public as such.

An injunction frequently is a proper remedy for the protection of the rights or welfare of the public as such where some ground for equitable jurisdiction exists.[56] In general, however, an injunction should not be granted when there is an

Soldier's retirement pay

(1) Enlisted man in Phillippine scouts was an "enlisted man in army" within retirement statute, and statutes were so clear that construction was unnecessary and payment of retirement pay constituted mere ministerial act, justifying mandatory injunction notwithstanding comptroller general's decision that payment was unauthorized.—Miguel v. McCarl, 54 S.Ct. 465, 291 U.S. 442, 78 L.Ed. 901, modifying McCarl v. Miguel, 66 F.2d 564, 62 App.D.C. 259, certiorari granted Miquel v. McCarl, 54 S.Ct. 102, 290 U.S. 618, 78 L.Ed. 540.

(2) Under such circumstances, a contention that petitioner has a remedy at law in the court of claims for his retired pay is not maintainable.—Miguel v. McCarl, supra.

(3) Mandatory injunction, however, would not lie to compel comptroller general to return voucher after advising disbursing officer that he was unauthorized to pay voucher for Philippine scout's retirement pay, nor to enjoin comptroller general's interference with payment thereof. —Miguel v. Other statement

Equity courts go much farther to give relief by injunction in furtherance of the public interest than they are accustomed to go where only private interests are involved.—Virginian Ry. Co. v. System Federation No. 40, Va., 57 S.Ct. 592, 300 U.S. 515, 81 L.Ed. 789, affirming, C.C.A.,

adequate remedy elsewhere,[57] although a showing of want of an adequate remedy at law is not necessarily required where a statute authorizes the remedy by injunction.[58]

Under general principles of equity, injunction has been regarded as a proper remedy to enforce, or to prevent the violation of, statutes regulating dealings or transactions involving certain commodities,[59] statutes requiring a license for the carrying on of certain operations,[60] or usury statutes.[61] In

Balancing of convenience

In determining the right to an injunction where the act complained of violates a clear legal right of the state and its inhabitants, there will not be a balancing of convenience.—American Book Co. v. State, 113 So. 592, 216 Ala. 367.

Right of federal government

(1) The federal government may, in a proper case, have the assistance of its courts by injunctive relief to promote the public interest and prevent injury to public welfare.—Reed v. Com'rs of Delaware County, D.C.Pa., 21 F.2d 144, affirmed, C.C.A., 21 F.2d 1018, certiorari granted 48 S.Ct. 324, 276 U.S. 613, 72 L.Ed. 731, and affirmed 48 S.Ct. 531, 277 U.S. 376, 72 L.Ed. 924—Walling v. Builders' Vencer & Woodwork Co., D.C.Wis., 45 F.Supp. 808.

(2) Where former attorney for federal securities and exchange commission was retained, without commission's consent, by bank involved with other defendants in proceedings previously commenced by commission, and subsequent to his retention submitted to an officer of the bank memorandum relating to those proceedings, government was entitled to enjoin use by defendants in the pending litigation of confidential information obtained by attorney while employed by commission.—U. S. v. Mahaney, D.C.Cal., 27 F.Supp. 463.

(3) In such case the facts were sufficient to show that the bank was a party to litigation with the commission so as to authorize an injunction against the bank.—U. S. v. Mahaney, supra.

(4) In such case, in determining right of government to an injunction, the attorney's consent to a permanent injunction against him was disregarded.—U. S. v. Mahaney, supra.

(5) Where delivery of tires by seller to buyer had not been made at time of promulgation by the price administrator of tire rationing regulations and freezing of stocks notwithstanding contract for sale had been entered into prior thereto, the price administrator was entitled to a permanent injunction against a violation of the regulations by the buyer notwithstanding up until the time of hearing the government had not determined whether it would requisition the frozen tires or release them to private use.—Henderson v. Smith-Douglass Co., D.C.Va., 44 F. Supp. 681.

Conduct connected with business affected with public interest

(1) Equity may intervene to restrain course of conduct in respect of a business affected with a public interest, which tends to affect public interest injuriously.—State Board of Milk Control v. Newark Milk Co., 179 A. 116, 118 N.J.Eq. 504.

(2) A contract in restraint of trade, entered into by fire insurance companies, the necessary effect and actual result of which is to control such business within a certain area, and to fix and regulate prices, and limit or eliminate competition to the injury of the public, is contrary to public policy and ultra vires, and may be restrained at the suit of the attorney-general.—McCarter v. Firemen's Ins. Co., 73 A. 80, 414, 74 N.J. Eq. 372, 135 Am.S.R. 708, 29 L.R.A.,N. S., 1194, 18 Ann.Cas. 1048, rehearing 61 A. 705, 70 N.J.Eq. 291.

(3) But, while general public has interest in regulation and control of insurance business, business of insurance agent is primarily a private enterprise, for damage to which, by enforcement of state inspection bureau's rules and regulations as to forms of policies and riders under a statute, such agent is not entitled to redress by injunction, under guise of asserting public right.—Hobbins v. Hannan, 202 N.W. 800, 186 Wis. 284.

Interference with school program

Injunction in suit by school district to prevent teachers who had wrongfully abandoned their classes from entering school building and interfering with conduct of school program and class recitations was proper remedy.—Cuba Consol. School Dist. No. 1 v. Fox, Mo.App., 79 S. W.2d 772.

Suit by organized township to enforce state law not authorized

Organized township cannot maintain action to enjoin holding or conducting public dances in violation of state law.—Denmark Tp., Ward County, v. Ukkelberg, 235 N.W. 353, 60 N.D. 508.

Federal Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1933

(1) It was held that the federal government was entitled to a temporary injunction to restrain defendant from dealing in certain commodities after revocation of license issued pursuant to Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1933.—U. S. v. Shissler, D.C.Ill., 7 F.Supp. 123.

(2) The right to an injunction against dealing in certain commodities after revocation of a license issued by the secretary of agriculture, purporting to act under such act of 1933, was denied, however, on the ground that such license was invalid in that the secretary, in issuing the license, acted in excess of his authority by attempting to regulate activities of defendant.—U. S. v. Seven Oaks Dairy Co., D.C.Mass., 10 F.Supp. 995.

60. Radio broadcasting

Suit by United States to restrain radio broadcasting without a license, in violation of former Radio Act of 1927, 44 U.S.St. at L. p 1162, c 169, as amended by Act of May 28, 1928, 45 U.S.St. at L. p 373, was within jurisdiction of equity.—U. S. v. American Bond & Mortgage Co., D.C. Ill., 31 F.2d 448, affirmed, C.C.A., American Bond & Mortgage Co. v. U. S., 52 F.2d 318, certiorari denied 52 S.Ct. 311, 285 U.S. 538, 76 L.Ed. 931.

61. In Kansas

(1) A suit by the state on the relation of the attorney general or the county attorney to enjoin a business conducted in flagrant violation of statutes respecting lawful interest rates will lie; the fact that such statutes do not make usury a crime and fix a penalty therefor does not preclude the maintenance of such suit, but, in fact, renders injunction suit the appropriate, if not the only available, remedy for the state.—State ex rel. Beck v. Basham, 70 P.

some jurisdictions, however, in the absence of statutory provision for injunction, injunction is not a proper remedy to prevent a person merely from making loans of his own money at usurious rates;[62] or to prevent the conduct or practice of a business or profession without the required license, if the matter complained of is not declared a nuisance by statute.[63]

By the terms of some statutes, the validity of which has been upheld in various cases,[64] injunction is a proper remedy to enforce, or to prevent the violation of, various statutes involving public rights or welfare or of rules under such statutes,[65] as, for example, statutes or orders thereunder regulating dealings or transactions involving certain commodities,[66] or regulating the carrying on of

(2) A single attempt by a dealer to exact usury in connection with the sale of property would not justify exercise of extraordinary remedy of injunction.—Smith v. Wyandotte Furniture Co., 119 P.2d 478, 154 Kan. 494.

Violation of small loan law

Injunction to restrain the carrying on of business of making small loans without obtaining a license under the statutory small loan law has been granted, notwithstanding the statute imposed penalties for violations.—Commonwealth ex rel. Grauman v. Continental Co., 121 S.W.2d 49, 275 Ky. 238.

63. N.D.—Richmond v. Miller, 292 N.W. 633, 70 N.D. 157.

Isolated transaction

A single instance of registering automobiles that were being illegally caravaned into the state in violation of a statute regulating the caravaning of motor vehicles would not justify an injunction prohibiting the person from carrying on travel information bureau business, in course of which such registration occurred.—Strickler v. Schaaf, 91 P.2d 1007, 199 Wash. 372, 123 A.L.R. 226.

64. Dealing in certain commodities

Va.—Reynolds v. Milk Commission of Virginia, 179 S.E. 507, 163 Va. 957.

Practicing profession without license

The validity of a statute authorizing an injunction to prevent the practice of a profession without the required license has been upheld.

Iowa.—State v. Fray, 241 N.W. 663, 214 Iowa 53, 81 A.L.R. 286.

Tenn.—Lamb v. Whitaker, 105 S.W. 2d 105, 171 Tenn. 485.

Congress has power to permit the issuance of injunctions without the showing ordinarily required by equity tribunals.—Fleming v. Salem Box Co., D.C.Or., 38 F.Supp. 997.

65. The purpose of an injunction, granted pursuant to statutory authorization, against violations of a statute is not to punish for past violations but to insure future compliance with the statute.—Walling v. Builders' Veneer & Woodwork Co., D.C.Wis., 45 F.Supp. 808—Fleming v. National Bank of Commerce of Charleston, D.C.W.Va., 41 F.Supp. 833—Fleming v. Phipps, D.C.Md., 35 F.Supp. 627.

Statutory grant

(1) In view of the limitation contained in § 6 of the statutory grant, the act of congress of Dec. 19, 1913, 38 U.S.St. at L. p 242 c 4, by the United States to the city and county of San Francisco, known as the "Hetch-Hetchy" grant, and of the provision of § 9 (u) of such grant for the maintenance of suits or proceedings to enforce and carry out the provisions of the statute, the federal government was entitled to enjoin city from transferring to private corporation right to sell electricity generated and transmitted through utilization of the grant, in order to prohibit continued use of the land in violation of declared policy of congress and to enforce the covenants of the city.—U. S. v. City and County of San Francisco, Cal., 60 S.Ct. 749, 310 U.S. 16, 84 L.Ed. 1050, reversing, C.C.A., City and County of San Francisco v. U. S., 106 F.2d 569, reversing, D.C., U. S. v. City and County of San Francisco, 23 F. Supp. 40, certiorari granted 60 S.Ct. 467, 309 U.S. 642, 84 L.Ed. 996, and rehearing denied 60 S.Ct. 1071, 310 U. S. 657, 84 L.Ed. 1420.

(2) In such case an injunction could be granted regardless of the reasons for violation of the statutory grant.—U. S. v. City and County of San Francisco, D.C.Cal., 23 F.Supp. 40, reversed, C.C.A., City and County of San Francisco v. U. S., 106 F.2d 569, certiorari granted U. S. v. City and County of San Francisco, 60 S. Ct. 467, 309 U.S. 642, 84 L.Ed. 996, reversed 60 S.Ct. 749, 310 U.S. 16, 84 L.Ed. 1050, rehearing denied 60 S.Ct. 1071, 310 U.S. 657, 84 L.Ed. 1420.

Injunction refused

(1) Federal Emergency Price Control Act of 1942, 50 U.S.C.A. Appendix § 901 et seq. does not require issuance of injunction against defendant who may have technically violated a provision of price schedules through error of fact in good-faith effort to comply with the law, regulations, and price schedule, and who had no intention to violate the act.—Henderson v. J. B. Beaird Corporation, D.C.La., 48 F.Supp. 252.

(2) The use of a name by a political group would not be enjoined as a violation of statute prohibiting use of name so as to deceive the public, since such statute is designed chiefly to cover commercial frauds and to reach deception involving property, and is not intended to control names, slogans, or pretensions of candidates for public office.—Brennan v. Mahoney, 300 N.Y.S. 1295, 165 Misc. 276, affirmed 299 N. Y.S. 750, 252 App.Div. 741.

(3) Pen.Code 1911 art 503 did not authorize court to enjoin use of dance hall, unless such use constituted a nuisance, or was unlawful or in violation of either article 496, 502, or 503, and, therefore, injunction merely restraining use of dance hall, where such use did not constitute nuisance and was not in violation of law, was improper.—Murphy v. State, Tex.Civ.App., 266 S.W. 807.

Federal agricultural marketing act

(1) An injunction against violation of an order under the federal agricultural marketing act of 1937 would be proper notwithstanding the effect of the act and the order would be to give cooperatives a monopoly of the commodity involved.—U. S. v. Rock Royal Co-op., N.Y., 59 S.Ct. 993, 307 U.S. 533, 83 L.Ed. 1446, modifying, D.C., U. S. v. Rock Royal Co-op., 26 F.Supp. 534, rehearing denied 60 S.Ct. 66, 308 U.S. 631, 84 L.Ed. 526, Dairymen's League Cooperative Ass'n v. Rock Royal Co-op., 60 S.Ct. 66, 308 U.S. 631, 84 L.Ed. 526, and Metropolitan Cooperative Milk Producers Bargaining Agency v. Rock Royal Co-op., 60 S.Ct. 67, 308 U.S. 631, 84 L.Ed. 526.

(2) Temporary injunctions have certain businesses or trades,[67] or statutes requiring a license for the practice of professions.[68]

An injunction to restrain the violation of a statute has been denied for want of a showing of irreparable injury to property or civil rights which cannot be redressed at law,[69] but, if a statute in terms authorizes an injunction to enforce, or to prevent the violation of, a statute or an order thereunder, usually an injunction may be granted without a showing of irreparable injury,[70] or of want of adequate remedy at law.[71]

Ordinances. While the propriety of an injunction to prevent the violation of certain municipal ordinances is recognized in some jurisdictions,[72] at least where there is no other adequate remedy,[73] it has been stated broadly that injunction is available to enforce municipal ordinance only when a statute creates a remedy by injunction.[74] According to some cases a court cannot restrain the threatened violation of an ordinance if the threatened act would not create a nuisance in fact,[75] and a court will not interfere by injunction if the municipality has the power to provide an adequate remedy at law for violations of the ordinance.[76] Some statutes authorize the remedy by injunction to restrain violations of ordinances.[77] Thus various statutes which confer on municipalities power to enact zoning ordinances or by-laws also authorize an injunction to restrain violations of such ordinances or by-laws,[78] and, under a constitutional provision authorizing municipalities to enforce police, sanitary, and other regulations, a municipality may maintain a suit for an injunction to prevent or restrain the violation of a zoning ordinance.[79] A statute which in terms authorizes a municipal corporation to maintain a suit to enjoin the violation of an ordinance does not authorize

In suit on behalf of city to enjoin landowner from using part of land as a lumber yard in alleged violation of zoning ordinance, granting preliminary injunction against such use was not an abuse of discretion, but landowner should be allowed to sell lumber remaining on premises in regular course of business pending trial, without replacing it with other lumber.—Miller v. Attacking validity of ordinance

The failure of lot owner to apply to board of adjustment for relief against restrictions placed on his lot by zoning ordinance did not preclude him from contending, in city's suit to enjoin construction of building on lot in violation of ordinance, that ordinance was unreasonable and discriminatory against him.—City of West University Place v. Ellis, Civ. App., 118 S.W.2d 907, affirmed 134 S.W.2d 1038, 134 Tex. 222.

Injunction refused

(1) Where owner of structure which was partially destroyed by fire had the right to rebuild notwithstanding the existence of a zoning ordinance, and he was informed by village authorities that permit required by zoning ordinance for restoration of structure would be refused, his restoration thereof without permit did not justify injunction requiring removal of structure.—Incorporated Village of North Hornell v. (3) Suit by an attorney to enjoin illegal practice of law by a corporation may be maintained notwithstanding the grant of relief will result indirectly in preventing the exercise of certain rights ostensibly granted to the corporation by its charter.—Dworken v. Apartment House Owners' Ass'n of Cleveland, 176 N.E. 577, 38 Ohio App. 265.

(4) Attorney may sue to enjoin illegal practice of law by corporation, although relief could be accomplished directly by quo warranto proceeding instituted by attorney general.—Dworken v. Apartment House Owners' Ass'n of Cleveland, supra.

(5) The view has been taken that a quo warranto proceeding would not afford such adequate remedy as is a prerequisite to the denial of equitable jurisdiction.—Goodman v. Western Bank & Trust Co., supra.

(6) That acts performed by an abstract company and a title guaranty company which constituted, prima facie at least, the practice of law, were performed pursuant to a regulation concerning fees to be charged by such companies which was adopted by state board of insurance commissioners, which supervised business conducted by companies, did not constitute a defense.—Stewart Abstract Co. v. Judicial Commission of Jefferson County, supra.

(7) Practice of law by corporation generally is discussed in Corporations § 956.

Services for pay or reward

In some cases, with respect to certain acts, relief by injunction has been limited to services for which compensation would be received or a charge would be made.

Wash.—Paul v. Stanley, 12 P.2d 401, 168 Wash. 371.

(1) Where a proceeding was instituted to have a person adjudged guilty of contempt for assuming to practice law without legal right, or, in the alternative, to have such person restrained or enjoined from continuing the acts complained of, and such person discontinued such acts when an order to show cause was served on him, an injunction was denied.—In re Clark, 11 N.Y.S.2d 432, 256 App.Div. 674.

(2) Testimony of defendants, who were not attorneys engaged in business of preparing simple income tax returns for wage earners and salaried employees, that after interlocutory hearing they decided not to perform their contracts to furnish legal services after the income tax returns were filed did not require denial of injunction against their practicing law by furnishing such legal services, where their decision was never made known to patrons and evidence did not show a genuine and permanent change of policy in this respect.—Lowell Bar Ass'n v. Loeb, 52 N.E.2d 27, 315 Mass. 176.

junction is authorized by some statutes.[84] It has been held, however, that an injunction will not be granted in a suit by an individual attorney solely on the theory that the illegal practice by another constitutes the violation of a property right or an encroachment on a franchise,[85] and that an injunction will not be granted in a suit by an individual attorney for his own benefit in the absence of a showing of a private right to the relief[86] or of a showing of special injury.[87]

The fact that the illegal practice of law is a criminal offense does not prevent the grant of an injunction,[88] a criminal prosecution not being regarded as an adequate remedy.[89]

Transactions involving securities. By virtue of some state statutes the attorney general of the state may institute a suit for, and obtain, an injunction against practices or transactions which are violative of the statute commonly known as the Blue ment Corporation, 168 A. 229, 114 N.J.Eq. 68.

Wash.—Paul v. Stanley, 12 P.2d 401, 168 Wash. 371.

(1) Injunction is a proper remedy to protect the special privilege in the nature of a franchise, included in the right of an attorney to practice law, from invasion by illegal practice by another.—Land Title Abstract & Trust Co. v. Dworken, 193 N.E. 650, 129 Ohio St. 23—Dworken v. Cleveland Auto Club, 29 Ohio N.P.,N.S., 607.

(2) Injunction is a proper remedy to prevent illegal practice of law when sought by attorneys acting for themselves and other members of the legal profession affected by such practice, in view of the character of the right to practice law as a special privilege or franchise, and, therefore, a property right or a right in the nature of a property right.

In Iowa the district court had jurisdiction of subject matter of suit by members of the bar to enjoin unlicensed practitioner from engaging in the practice of law; whether plaintiffs had a valuable right, privilege, or franchise which was being unlawfully encroached on by defendant, to the irreparable injury or damage and injury of plaintiffs and others similarly situated, and whether plaintiffs were entitled to injunctive relief, were questions to be determined by the trial court after hearing the evidence.—Johnson v. Purcell, 282 N.W. 741, 225 Iowa 1265.

Statute applicable to professions generally

(1) Under a statute authorizing an injunction against the practice of a profession without the required license, an injunction against the practice of law without a license may be granted.—State v. Retail Credit Men's Ass'n of Chattanooga, 43 S.W.2d 918, 163 Tenn. 450.

(2) The validity of such statute as applied to the practice of law without a license has been upheld.—Lamb v. Whitaker, 105 S.W.2d 105, 171 Tenn. 485.

(3) Injunction against a corporation has been granted under such statute.—State v. Retail Credit Men's Ass'n of Chattanooga, supra.

(4) Suit for injunction may be prosecuted by attorneys individually and as representatives of bar association in view of Code 1932 § 9976.—Lineberger v. State ex rel. Beeler, 129 S.W.2d 198, 174 Tenn. 538—Lamb v. Whitaker, 105 S.W.2d 105, 171 Tenn. 485.

In Massachusetts, under Gen.L. c 221 § 46B, inserted by St.1935, c 346 § 2, injunction to restrain the unauthorized practice of law may be granted on the petition of the attorney general; the authority of the state court to restrain such practice may include practice in federal courts in so far as there is no conflict with federal statute, rule, or established practice.—In re Lyon, 16 N.E.2d 74, 301 Mass. 80.

86. Mass.—Steinberg v. McKay, 3 N.E.2d 23, 295 Mass. 139.

Want of showing of unlawful competition

In a case in which an injunction was denied on the ground that there was no showing of a private right to relief, it was pointed out that plaintiff failed to allege or prove that he earned his living by practicing law and that defendant was unlawfully in competition with him.—Steinberg v. McKay, supra.

87. N.Y.—Wollitzer v. National Title Guaranty Co., 266 N.Y.S. 184, 148 Misc. 529, affirmed Wollitzer v. Title Guarantee & Trust Co., 270 N.Y.S. 968, 241 App.Div. 757, leave to appeal denied 270 N.Y.S. 987, 241 App.Div. 817.

Suit by members of committee of bar association

Members of a committee of a bar association, suing for themselves and for the association, to enjoin advertising by defendant in violation of a statute, were not entitled to an injunction without a showing of special damage to their property rights as licensed practicing attorneys, and the showing was insufficient where it appeared that defendant had never practiced law and had never intended to practice.—Burch v. Mellor, 43 Pa.Dist. & Co. 597.

Practice by judicial officer

An injunction was a proper remedy to prevent further violation by probate judge of statute making it unlawful for probate judges or justices of the peace to perform legal services in cases pending before them or be interested in profits arising out of any practice in their own courts, notwithstanding statute was a criminal statute prescribing fines.—Wheat v. Hilkey, 79 P.2d 865, 148 Kan. 60.

Sky Law,[90] and the court may also enjoin the guilty person from dealing in any securities within the state.[91]

The federal Securities Act of 1933 § 20 (b), 15 U.S.C.A. § 77 t (b), authorizes the Securities and Exchange Commission to maintain a suit for an injunction where a person is engaged in or about to engage in acts or practices which constitute or will constitute a violation of the provisions of such act or of any rule or regulation prescribed under the authority of such act,[92] and the federal Securities Exchange Act of 1934 § 21 (e), 15 U.S.C.A.

N.Y.—People v. Photocolor Corporation, 281 N.Y.S. 130, 156 Misc. 47.

Showing required

The attorney general is entitled to an injunction on a showing that it appears to him that defendant has or is engaged, or is about to engage, in the sale of securities condemned by the statute, or that he believes it to be in the public interest that an investigation shall be made and that defendant refuses to make a report.—Attorney General v. Tomadelli Electronic Corporation, 140 A. 26, 102 N.J.Eq. 186, affirmed Katzenbach v. Tomadelli Electronic Corporation, 144 A. 920, 104 N.J.Eq. 217.

Transactions which may be enjoined

(1) Fraudulent issuance of certificate of membership in corporation selling sick and death benefit insurance.—Stevens v. Atlantic & Security Mut. Ass'ns, 174 A. 744, 116 N.J.Eq. 584.

(2) Selling, offering for sale, or recommending shares of a corporation by means of misrepresentations as to subsidiaries and as to past earnings.—Stevens v. Rayon Industries Corporation, 169 A. 717, 115 N. J.Eq. 92.

(3) Original sale of shares of corporate stock, where misrepresentation and concealment were shown.—Stevens v. Associated Mortg. Co. of New Jersey, 152 A. 461, 107 N.J.Eq. 297, affirmed 158 A. 343, 110 N.J.Eq. 70—Stevens v. Adelphia Finance Service, 152 A. 460, 107 N.J.Eq. 222.

(4) Sale of securities if it results in cheating buyers, regardless of seller's ignorance of falsity of his representations.—People v. Federated Radio Corporation, 214 N.Y.S. 670, 216 App.Div. 250, affirmed 154 N.E. 655, 244 N.Y. 33.

Who may be enjoined

(1) All participating in selling securities, illegal under Securities Act, may be enjoined from dealing in any securities in state.—Stevens v. Washington Loan Co., 152 A. 20, 107 N.J.Eq. 94, affirmed 156 A. 420, 109 N.J.Eq. 128.

(2) Officers and directors of corporation fraudulently selling securities, keeping false books of account, and issuing false prospectuses, who failed actively to participate in affairs of corporation and to prevent such fraudulent practices, were concerned in and with fraudulent practices within statute providing for injunction permanently restraining persons concerned in or with fraudulent practices from further dealings in securities, and such officers and directors could so be restrained.—People v. Photocolor Corporation, 281 N.Y.S. 130, 156 Misc. 47.

(3) In such case a corporate director may not sit idly by where he knows or should know that securities of the corporation are being fraudulently offered for sale to the public, and avoid liability to restraint by injunction by reason of supineness or dereliction, of duty.—People v. Photocolor Corporation, supra.

(4) In such case, however, an injunction should not be granted against salesmen who merely made sales in reliance on information furnished them by their superiors.—People v. Photocolor Corporation, supra.

Construction of statute

The above-mentioned statutory provision should so be construed as to achieve the purpose of its enactment, which is to protect the investing public, if the language used is susceptible of such a construction.—Otis & Co. v. Securities and Exchange Commission, C.C.A.Ohio, 106 F.2d 579, affirming, D.C., Securities and Exchange Commission v. Otis & Co., 18 F.Supp. 100.

Security Act § 17, 15 U.S.C.A. § 77 q, as to fraudulent transactions

(1) Use of interstate facilities or mails in making fraudulent sales of securities in violation of Securities Act § 17 (a), 15 U.S.C.A. § 77 q (a), may be enjoined.—Otis & Co. v. Securities and Exchange Commission, supra—Securities and Exchange Commission v. Pyne, D.C.Mass., 39 F.Supp. 434—Securities and Exchange Commission v. Timetrust, Inc., D.C.Cal., 39 F.Supp. 145, remanded, C.C.A., 130 F.2d 214, and modified on other grounds 142 F.2d 744—Securities and Exchange Commission v. Pyne, D.C.Mass., 33 F. Supp. 988—Securities & Exchange Commission v. Timetrust, Inc., D.C. Cal., 28 F.Supp. 34—Securities and Exchange Commission v. Lawson, D. C.Md., 24 F.Supp. 360—Securities and Exchange Commission v. Security and Exchange Commission, 57 S.Ct. 46, 299 U.S. 581, 81 L.Ed. 428—Securities and Exchange Commission v. Torr, D.C.N.Y., 15 F. Supp. 315, reversed on other grounds, C.C.A., 87 F.2d 446.

(2) The character of matters sent by mail is immaterial, as respects right of Securities and Exchange Commission to have defendant enjoined from engaging in fraudulent practices in sale of securities by use of mails in violation of such subsection.—Securities and Exchange Commission v. Timetrust, Inc., D.C. Cal., 28 F.Supp. 34.

(3) In suit to enjoin alleged violations of such subsection, defendants could not disclaim responsibility for untrue statements allegedly made to prospective purchasers of trust certificates on ground that entire transaction was contained in written certificate and agreement of trust.—Securities and Exchange Commission v. Timetrust, Inc., D.C. Cal., 39 F.Supp. 145, remanded, C.C. A., 130 F.2d 214, and modified on other grounds 142 F.2d 744.

(4) Injunction based on alleged violation of such subsection was denied as to certain defendants where there was no showing as to such de-

§ 78 u (e), confers like authority on such commission with respect to acts or practices which constitute or will constitute a violation of such act or of any rule or regulation under such act.[93] Failure to show threatened irreparable injury[94] or want of an adequate remedy at law[95] does not defeat the right to an injunction, in view of the fact that the statute expressly authorizes suit; nor does the fact that the suit was preceded by an illegal investigation by the Securities and Exchange Commission require the dismissal of the suit.[96] It has been held that such statutory provisions do not require that the condition of engaging, or of being about to engage, in illegal acts or practices should continue until the commencement of the suit in order to permit the grant of an injunction,[97] but it has also been held that an injunction should not be granted where the illegal acts or practices were discontinued before suit was brought and the circumstances do not support any reasonable inference that such acts or practices would be resumed.[98] An injunction may properly be granted under such statutory provisions where defendant was engaged in illegal acts or practices when suit was commenced,[99] fendants' method of approach to customers.—Securities and Exchange Commission v. Torr, D.C.N.Y., 22 F. Supp. 602.

Securities Act § 5 (a), 15 U.S.C.A. § 77 e (a).

(1) Use of interstate facilities or mail in making sale of unregistered securities, in violation of Securities Act § 5 (a), 15 U.S.C.A. § 77 e (a), may be enjoined.—Securities and Exchange Commission v. Chinese Consol. Benev. Ass'n, C.C.A.N.Y., 120 F. 2d 738, reversing, D.C., 39 F.Supp. 85, and certiorari denied Chinese Consol. Benev. Ass'n v. Crude Oil Corporation of America, D.C.Wis., 17 F. Supp. 164, affirmed, C.C.A., 93 F.2d 844.

(2) Defendant may not dispute the apparent effect of language used in a letter of defendant on the question whether a particular act violated such subsection and, therefore, could be enjoined.—Securities and Exchange Commission v. Associated Gas & Electric Co., supra.

(3) Bill of complaint in suit by securities and exchange commission for injunction against corporation and its agents securing unregistered contracts for delivery of oil by it, in violation of such subsection, should be dismissed as against a defendant merely arranging for employment of codefendant as corporation's agent in procuring such contracts.—Securities and Exchange Commission v. Crude Oil Corporation of America, supra.

Acts or practices which may be enjoined

(1) Solicitation by mail, in violation of Securities Exchange Act § 14, 15 U.S.C.A. § 78 n, of proxies for securities registered on a national securities exchange.—Securities and Exchange Commission v. O'Hara Re-Election (or Proxy) Committee, D.C.Mass., 28 F.Supp. 523.

(2) Act of broker transacting business in securities through the medium of a member of a national securities exchange, in contracting excessive indebtedness in violation of Securities Exchange Act § 8 b, 15 U.S.C.A. § 78 h (b).—Securities and Exchange Commission v. Lawson, D.C.Md., 24 F.Supp. 360.

(3) Use of facilities of interstate commerce, mails, and the facilities of a national securities exchange to broaden market in security registered on such an exchange, in violation of Securities Exchange Act § 9 (a) (2), 15 U.S.C.A. § 78 i (a) (2).—Securities and Exchange Commission v. Torr, D.C.N.Y., 22 F.Supp. 602—Securities and Exchange Commission v. Torr, D.C.N.Y., 15 F.Supp. 315, reversed on other grounds, C.C.A., 87 F.2d 446.

Acts or practices prior to commencement of suit

(1) The view apparently was taken that an injunction might be granted if defendant was violating the statute when the Securities and Exchange Commission commenced its investigation on which the suit for injunction was based.—Otis & Co. v. Securities and Exchange Commission, supra.

(2) In the foregoing case, while an injunction was granted on the ground that certain acts or practices were violative of the securities act of 1933, the lower court refused an injunction sought on the ground that there was a violation of Securities and Exchange Act of 1934 § 9 (a) (2), 15 U.S.C.A. § 78 i (a) (2), against securities dealer on account of underwriting plan which contemplated sale of stock off the exchange at prices to be stabilized by exchange transactions, where all stock underwritten had been disposed of before bill was filed, commission had not prescribed regulations prohibiting transactions to stabilize prices, and commission had been informed of contemplated stabilization transactions.—Securities and Exchange Commission v. Otis & Co., D.C.Ohio, 18 F.Supp. 100, affirmed, C.C.A., Otis & Co. v. Securities and Exchange Commission, 106 F.2d 579.

Discontinuance after suit brought

(1) The fact that, after suit was commenced, defendant discontinued the illegal practices complained of does not necessarily prevent the grant of an injunction.—Securities and Exchange Commission v. Lawson, D.C.Md., 24 F.Supp. 360.

(2) The Securities and Exchange Commission was entitled to an injunction restraining a broker from certain practices which were violations both of the securities act and or on the theory that defendant was about to engage in illegal acts or practices at the time suit was commenced, where, from the fact that he had previously engaged in such acts or practices, the inference can legitimately be drawn that, at the time suit was commenced, there was a probability of his continuing or resuming a like course of conduct.[1] Injunctions to prevent violations of the federal Public Utility Holding Act of 1935 are discussed in the C.J.S. title Public Utilities § 71.

By whom proceedings instituted. As a general rule if a mere public right is to be vindicated or the mere evasion of law is to be prevented, suit for injunction should be brought by some public officer or body especially charged with a duty in this regard and not by a private individual who is not especially authorized by statute to bring suit under the particular circumstances.[2] It has been stated broadly however that a court does not have jurisdiction to grant an injunction at the suit of public authorities except by virtue of express statutory authority or to abate a public nuisance.[3]

A suit to restrain a public wrong, when the individual complaining suffers only such injury as is common to the other members of the community, or when the suit is on behalf of the state, should be brought by the attorney general or some other public officer duly authorized,[4] or, under the laws of some states, by an individual with the consent of the attorney general,[5] or by the attorney general and a taxpayer,[6] or by the attorney general and public service commissioners;[7] but an attorney general cannot go beyond his statutory powers in this respect.[8] If the attorney general refuses to bring suit, it may be brought in the name of the state at the relation of a taxpayer and citizen thereof;[9] but relief will not be granted in such a suit if it is not in fact brought for the protection of public rights, but is brought in aid of a private enterprise.[10] of the securities exchange act, notwithstanding broker had wound up his business after filing of bill and had made restitution in part to his customers and provision for further payments to them, since the test in determining the propriety of an injunction was not whether the illegal practices had been discontinued and restitution had been made within the present ability of defendant, but was whether in the public interest plaintiff commission was entitled to an injunction on the proof; the court stated that, if plaintiff commission was otherwise entitled to an injunction, a reason for granting it was that an injunction might be the basis of further administrative action by the commission.—Securities and Exchange Commission v. Lawson, supra.

Attorney general as coplaintiff

Under statutes authorizing pleading by making proper parties specifying the nature of suits and proceedings which the attorney general may conduct on his own information or on complaint of a private person, he may maintain, or be a coplaintiff in, an action by a certified public accountant to enjoin the state board of accountancy from examining applicants for certificates beyond the state.—McCullough v. Scott, 109 S.E. 789, 182 N.C. 865.

City could not enjoin corporation from operation of "bank night" as abuse of corporate franchise by operation of lottery, since such right was confided solely to attorney general.—City of Wink v. Griffith Amusement Co., 100 S.W.2d 695, 129 Tex. 40, reversing, Civ.App., 78 S.W. 2d 1065.

The section of the Fair Labor Standards Act providing that litigation under the act shall be subject to direction and control of the attorney general does not require that he be a party to, or participate in, an action for an injunction against future violations of the act.—Walling v. Sun Pub. Co., D.C.Tenn., 47 F.Supp. 180, affirmed, C.C.A., 140 F. 2d 445.

§ 124. Public Safety, Health, and Convenience

Acts which endanger the public health or safety may be enjoined.

Acts which are a menace to the public health[12] or safety,[13] or, as sometimes stated in greater detail, acts which are dangerous to human life, detrimental to public health, and the occasion of great public inconvenience and damage,[14] may be enjoined. The power to issue an injunction in these circumstances belongs to the general powers possessed by courts of equity,[15] and is also conferred by some statutes[16] applicable to various situations or matters,[17] and a municipality is authorized to sue for an injunction to prevent or restrain the violation of municipal police and sanitary regulations by a constitutional provision authorizing municipalities to enforce such regulations.[18] In some cases, however, an injunction has been refused where there is another adequate remedy.[19]

According to some cases, the erection of a structure in a municipality which will not be unduly dangerous to life and property and which will not constitute a nuisance will not be enjoined.[20] In some

Water supply
(1) Injunction may be a proper remedy to prevent the shutting off of a water supply required for public or municipal purposes.—Bienville Water Supply Co. v. Mobile, 20 So. 742, 112 Ala. 260, 57 Am.S.R. 28, 33 L.R.A. 59.

(2) Thus a school board is entitled to an injunction to prevent a municipality or a municipal officer from shutting off the supply of water to the public schools because of failure to pay water rates.
N.J.—Board of Education of Borough of Glassboro v. Borough of Glassboro, 149 A. 820, 106 N.J.Eq. 38.
N.Y.—Board of Education of City of Lockport v. Richmond, 137 N.Y.S. 62.

(3) A municipality may enjoin a water company from shutting off a supply of water required for fire protection or for other municipal purposes.—Bienville Water Supply Co. v. Mobile, supra.

(4) In such case a preliminary injunction may be granted pending settlement of disputed questions as to rates.—Washington v. Washington Water Co., 62 A. 390, 70 N.J.Eq. 254.

(5) A municipality may restrain a company which has agreed to supply a distributing company with water from ceasing such supply.—City of Bayoune v. New Jersey Water Co., N.J.Ch., 108 A. 121.

(6) The commissioners of a water district may restrain a water company from discontinuing to supply water under a contract, notwithstanding the contract was one which the commissioners were not authorized to make, where defendant water company was a party to the formation of the water district, had given tacit approval to its formation, and had operated under, and received benefits from, the contract.—Salmon v. Ordinance fixing fire limits
(1) Injunction to restrain erection of building in municipality in violation of ordinance fixing fire limits has been denied where the building would not constitute a nuisance in fact.
Mich.—Village of St. Johns v. McFarlan, 33 Mich. 72.
N.H.—City of Manchester v. Smyth, 10 A. 700, 64 N.H. 380.
Pa.—Ellwood City v. Mani, 16 Pa. Co. 474.

(2) Such an injunction, sought by a municipal corporation, was denied, where there was no showing that the building would constitute a nuisance or that its construction would work irreparable injury to plaintiff, and the ordinance made provision for penalties which did not appear to be inadequate.—Williamsport v. McFadden, 15 Wkly.N.C., Pa., 269.

(3) Where, after an ordinance established a fire limit, an inspector of buildings issued a building permit, but prior to the publication of the ordinance revoked such permit on jurisdictions, however, an injunction will lie to prevent the violation of an ordinance fixing fire limits,[21] at least where there is no other adequate remedy.[22]

Illegal practice of medicine and other professions. In some jurisdictions injunction has been regarded as a proper remedy to prevent the illegal practice of medicine or surgery,[23] dentistry,[24] pharmacy,[25] or optometry.[26] Some statutes, the validity of which has been upheld in various cases,[27] in terms authorize the grant of an injunction in this type of cases.[28] the ground that the building covered thereby was within such fire limit, an injunction to prevent the holder of the permit from completing the building was denied, it having been substantially erected before the ordinance became operative by publication.—Reynolds v. 23. Tenn.—State v. Anderson, 6 Tenn.Civ.A. 1.

Injunction refused
A physician, who was licensed in another state and who confined his practice to an area in Arkansas, which was owned by the federal government, furnishing services to employees of a construction company pursuant to a contract between the United States and such company, could not properly be enjoined on the ground that he was not licensed to practice under the laws of Arkansas.—Lynch v. Hammock, 165 S.W. 2d 369, 204 Ark. 911.

Ky.—Jones v. Commonwealth, 300 S. W. 346, 213 Ky. 648—Kentucky State Board of Dental Examiners v. Payne, 281 S.W. 188, 213 Ky. 382.

Practicing without obtaining license
(1) Injunction has been recognized as a proper remedy to prevent the practice of dentistry without a license.—Jones v. Commonwealth, 300 S.W. 346, 213 Ky. 648—Kentucky State Board of Dental Examiners v. Payne, 281 S.W. 188, 213 Ky. 382.

(2) Where provisions of original act, requiring license as prerequisite to practicing dentistry, in effect when judgment enjoining practice of dentistry without license was rendered, were repealed and simultaneously reënacted, the judgment was efficacious to prevent defendant from practicing dentistry.—Jones v. Kentucky State Board of Dental Examiners, 163 S.W.2d 297, 291 Ky. 186.

Failure to renew license
Commonwealth's suit on relation of attorney general and others, to enjoin dentist from practicing because of noncompliance with statute requiring annual renewal certificates was proper remedy, on principle that, where law is inadequate and general public welfare is involved, equity will grant relief.—Commonwealth ex rel. Attorney General v. Pollitt, 80 S. W.2d 543, 258 Ky. 489.

Practicing without payment of valid occupation tax
Practice of profession by dentist within corporate limits of city in open violation of valid ordinance imposing occupation tax would be enjoinable in suit by city on showing that dentist's continued refusal to comply with ordinance encouraged others to violate ordinance thereby depriving city of necessary income, and constituting nuisance.—City of Independence v. Hindenach, 61 P.2d 124, 144 Kan. 414, 107 A.L.R. 645.

Enjoining attempted amendment of charter of dental college
Where proposed charter amendment sought to confer on dental college and students thereof privilege of practicing dentistry without required examination and license, injunction would lie, since proposed amendment would authorize practice of dentistry in violation of statute.—Boykin v. Atlanta-Southern Dental College, 169 S.E. 361, 177 Ga. 1.

25. Ky.—Commonwealth ex rel. Attorney General v. Brown, 39 S.W. 2d 223, 239 Ky. 197.

26. Ariz.—Funk Jewelry Co. v. State ex rel. La Prade, 50 P.2d 945, 46 Ariz. 348.

Jurisdiction
Chancery court had jurisdiction of subject matter of suit to enjoin operation of department of optometry in department store in violation of statute.—Gainsburg v. Dodge, 101 S. W.2d 178, 193 Ark. 473.

Unfair trade and practice
Registered optometrist could maintain suit to enjoin unfair trade and practice which would be injurious to their interest, notwithstanding such practices were punishable by criminal penalties.—Seifert v. Buhl Optical Co., 268 N.W. 784, 276 Mich. 692.

Violation of statute not criminal offense
In view of the fact that a violation of the statute regulating the practice of optometry is not made a criminal offense, the state, acting through the attorney general, may sue to enjoin such violation.—Funk Jewelry Co. v. State ex rel. La Prade, 50 P.2d 945, 46 Ariz. 348.

Practice by corporation enjoined
(1) In general.—Funk Jewelry Co. v. State ex rel. La Prade, supra.

(2) Corporation of another state. —Neill v. Gimbel Brothers, 199 A. 178, 330 Pa. 213.

Acts or practices not ground for injunction
(1) An injunction against a corporation to prevent it from practicing optometry was improper where its acts were not illegal.—Kindy Opticians v. Michigan State Board of Examiners in Optometry, 289 N.W. 112, 291 Mich. 152.

(2) Leasing of space by department store to optical company hiring licensed optometrists was not enjoinable as practicing optometry.—Golding v. Shubach Optical Co., 70 P.2d 871, 93 Utah 32.

(3) Corporation not enjoinable as practicing optometry because it employed a registered and licensed optometrist to furnish services to patrons.—Dvorine v. Castelberg Jewelry Corporation, 185 A. 562, 170 Md. 661.

Various acts enjoined

Illegal practice also criminal offense
The validity of such a statute, applicable to the illegal practice of medicine, has been upheld notwithstanding such illegal practice is made a criminal offense.
Iowa.—State v. Fray, 241 N.W. 663, 214 Iowa 53, 81 A.L.R. 286.
Utah.—Board of Medical Examiners v. Blair, 196 P. 221, 57 Utah 516.

28. Medicine or surgery
(1) The practice of medicine or surgery without the required license may be enjoined in a suit by the state under the terms of some statutes.
Ind.—State ex rel. Indiana State Board of Medical Registration and Examination v. Cole, 20 N.E.2d 972, 215 Ind. 562.
Iowa.—State v. Howard, 245 N.W. 871, 216 Iowa 545.

In some jurisdictions, in the absence of special authorization of an injunction, the mere violation of the statute regulating practice,[29] as, for example, merely practicing without the required license,[30] is not of itself ground for an injunction, but, in at least some of the jurisdictions in which this rule obtains, injunction is a proper remedy to prevent acts of an unlicensed and incompetent practitioner, which are injurious to the public health and constitute a public nuisance.[31]

Kan.—State ex rel. Beck v. Cooper, 78 P.2d 884, 147 Kan. 710.

(2) A person purporting to practice "naprapathy" and, as a guide to treatment, to diagnose the ailments of his patients, without having obtained a license to practice medicine and surgery or any other recognized system of healing, could be enjoined, under the statute, in a suit to enjoin the practice of medicine and surgery without a license. —State v. Howard, supra.

(3) Fact that defendant, stating desire to be examined for license to practice "naprapathy," requested information from health board, which sent copy of examiners' rules, did not estop state and administrative officers from enjoining defendant's practice.—State v. Howard, supra.

(4) Fact that term "cancer" was not specifically mentioned in medical practice act did not preclude court from enjoining defendant from engaging in unlawful practice of medicine by treating cancer without a license.—State ex rel. Beck v. Cooper, supra.

(5) State is entitled to injunction to restrain a person from practicing medicine without license on showing existing practice, without showing that such person will continue, unless restricted.—State v. Howard, supra—State v. Fray, 241 N.W. 663, 214 Iowa 53, 81 A.L.R. 286.

(6) It is not necessary to make a showing of threatened injury, procedure under the statute not being governed by general rule of chancery practice.—State v. Fray, supra.

(7) Statute authorizing injunction to prevent one practicing profession without license was not applicable where state board of medical examiners had issued physician's license and had not revoked it, even though act under which it was issued was claimed to be invalid.—State v. Hartley, 54 S.W.2d 960, 165 Tenn. 278.

(8) The reference, in Business Corp.L.1933 § 8 (c), Smith-Hurd St. Annot. c 32 § 157.8 (c), to the remedy by injunction to restrain a corporation from the transaction of unauthorized business did not apply to a case in which the state, by the attorney general, sought to test the right of a corporation to practice medicine, in view of the limitations on the operation of such § 8 contained in such section.—People, by Kerner, v. United Medical Service, 200 N.E. 157, 362 Ill. 442, 103 A.L.R. 1229.

Dentistry

(1) Under the terms of some statutes practicing dentistry without the required license may be enjoined.—State ex rel. Indiana State Board of Dental Examiners v. Boston System Dentists, 19 N.E.2d 949, 215 Ind. 485.

(2) The practice of dentistry without a license has been enjoined in a suit by the state brought under Code 1931 § 2519.—State v. Bailey Dental Co., 234 N.W. 260, 211 Iowa 781.

(3) Articles of incorporation adopted after enactment of statute requiring license to practice dentistry, authorizing corporation to manufacture and deal in dental supplies and other merchandise, did not preclude injunction against corporation, pursuant to statute, against practice without license on ground that such injunction would forfeit corporate franchise.—State ex rel. Indiana State Board of Dental Examiners v. Boston System Dentists, supra.

(4) Particular acts or practices have been regarded as insufficient ground for an injunction.—State ex rel. Kennedy v. Lepon, 36 N.E.2d 276, 219 Ind. 1.

Pharmacy

In a suit by the state, corporation selling aspirin contrary to statute regulating practice of pharmacy could be restrained by injunction from making such sale, under Code 1927 § 2519.—State v. Jewitt Market Co., 228 N.W. 288, 209 Iowa 567.

Optometry

(1) The state may maintain a suit to enjoin the practice of optometry without a license, under Code 1931 § 2519.—State v. Kindy Optical Co., 248 N.W. 332, 216 Iowa 1157.

(2) Rule applies to practice by a corporation.—State v. Kindy Optical Co., supra.

Usually the purpose of granting an injunction in this type of cases is to protect the public health or welfare,[32] but, according to some cases, injunction is a proper remedy to protect from encroachment by a person who practices illegally the valuable franchise or privilege of a duly authorized practitioner of medicine,[33] dentistry,[34] or optometry.[35] The rule has been announced, however, that whether the holder of a statutory license has such a property right as to permit him to seek relief in equity by injunction is determinable first by the construction of the statute and secondly by equitable principles.[36] In some cases the right of a duly licensed practitioner to an injunction against a person who practices without the required license has been denied in the case of the unlicensed practice of medicine,[37] optometry,[38] or chiropody.[39]

35. Property right

Duly licensed practitioners of optometry may be entitled to an injunction to restrain the illegal practice of optometry by unlicensed persons, for the purpose of protecting the property right involved in the right to practice.—Ezell v. Ritholz, 198 S.E. 419, 188 S.C. 39.

36. N.H.—New Hampshire Board of Registration in Optometry v. Scott Jewelry Co., 9 A.2d 513, 90 N.H. 368.

Limitations on right to injunction

Generally, a person holding a statutory license is entitled to injunctive relief only if a defendant's unlawful practice threatens irreparable injury to alleged right conferred by license or the unlawful intrusion is a series of acts from which the common-law remedies afford inadequate protection, or if the unlawful practice is regarded as a public nuisance injuring his property right, or if he is in a position to show damage.—New Hampshire Board of Registration in Optometry v. Scott Jewelry Co., supra.

37. In Ohio

(1) It has been held that a person who was duly authorized to practice medicine could not invoke the remedy by injunction to prevent unlawful competition by an unlicensed practitioner, especially where illegal practice was a criminal offense.—Merz v. Murchison, 30 Ohio Cir.Ct. 646.

(2) Compare, however, Ohio cases supra § 123 as to illegal practice of law and supra this section as to illegal practice of dentistry.

38. In New Hampshire

(1) Whether duly licensed individual optometrists could enjoin alleged illegal practice of optometry by corporation which employed an optometrist depended on whether it was necessary for a court of equity to act in order to protect rights recognized in equity.—New Hampshire Board of Registration in Optometry v. Scott Jewelry Co., 9 A.2d 513, 90 N.H. 368.

(2) In view of the facts that the statute regulating the practice of optometry was enacted purely for the public good, that the enforcement of the act was left to the normal action of public officials, and that any decreased competition resulting from the statute was merely incidental, licensed individual optometrists by virtue of license to practice optometry had no right to noncompetition by unlicensed persons or persons unlawfully practicing optometry as would entitle them to injunctive relief against such persons.—New Hampshire Board of Registration in Optometry v. Scott Jewelry Co., supra.

Reason for rule

Unlicensed practice of chiropody by corporation not enjoinable at suit of licensed chiropodists, since statute regulating practice of chiropody was not enacted for benefit of licensed chiropodists.—Mosig v. Jersey Chiropodists, supra.

Incompetent practitioner

Practice of medicine or surgery will be enjoined where acts of unlicensed and incompetent practitioner are injurious to public health and constitute existing or threatened public nuisance, although offender is amenable to criminal laws.—State ex rel. La Prade v. Smith, 29 P.2d 718, 43 Ariz. 131, 92 A.L.R. 168, reheard 31 P.2d 102, 43 Ariz. 343, 92 A.L.R. 168.

Encroachment on rights of licensed physicians

Fact that practicing medicine without license is public offense does not prevent court from enjoining unlicensed person from encroaching on valuable franchise rights of licensed physicians.—Sloan v. Mitchell, 168 S.E. 800, 113 W.Va. 506.

Injunction against criminal act in general see infra §§ 150–155.

Ohio.—Taylor v. The New System Prosthetic Dental Laboratory, Inc., 29 Ohio N.P.,N.S., 451.

In Indiana after citing the statute, Burns St.Annot.1933 § 63-513, which specifically provides for an injunction to prevent the practice of dentistry without a license, it was stated that, even though an injunction were not specifically authorized, the situation presented brought the case within the rule that, where the protection of the public welfare is involved, equity will intervene notwithstanding the wrong complained of is also a crime.—State ex rel. Indiana State Board of Dental Examiners v. Boston System Dentists, 19 N.E.2d 949, 215 Ind. 485.

42. Ky.—Commonwealth ex rel. At-

try[43] is made a criminal offense does not, according to some cases, prevent the grant of an injunction, at least where a statute in terms authorizes an injunction;[44] the criminal prosecution does not necessarily constitute an adequate remedy at law so as to preclude resort to equity for an injunction.[45] According to some cases, however, injunction is not a proper remedy where a criminal prosecution constitutes an adequate remedy.[46] The fact that practicing without a license is a criminal offense is not of itself ground for an injunction.[47]

The application of requirements of license and the like to particular acts or practices is discussed in the C.J.S. title Physicians and Surgeons § 10, also 48 C.J. p 1073 note 5–p 1079 note 7.

§ 125. Public Property

Injunction is a proper remedy to protect public property.

An injunction is frequently a proper remedy for the protection of public property.[48] In general a private individual may not bring a suit for an injunction if he does not suffer a special injury.[49] An injunction has been refused in a suit by an individual, where an injunction, if granted, would permit him to determine how a public building should be decorated.[50]

§ 126. —— Disposition

The unlawful transfer of public property may be prevented by injunction.

The unlawful transfer of public property may be enjoined;[51] but an injunction will not be granted where the transfer is made by officers acting within the powers vested in them, and it does not appear that their action in so doing is arbitrary or an abuse of discretion.[52]

A private entity or individual who would sustain a special injury from the illegal transfer or sale of public property may maintain a suit to enjoin such transfer or sale.[53]

46. In New Hampshire

The state was not entitled to an injunction against the allegedly illegal practice of optometry by a corporation and by a licensed optometrist who was employed by such corporation, since, if such optometrist was practicing illegally, there was an adequate remedy as to him by prosecution under a penal statute or by revocation of his certificate, and, if prosecution under such statute did not constitute an adequate remedy as to the corporation, the state could resort to quo warranto proceedings to oust the corporation from the exercise of powers ultra vires if it was guilty of illegal practice.—New Hampshire Board of Registration in Optometry v. Scott Jewelry Co., 9 A.2d 513, 90 N.H. 368.

Chiropractic

The state was not entitled to injunction against unlicensed practice of chiropractic.—State v. Mallby, 188 N.W. 175, 108 Neb. 578.

47. In Georgia it has been held that, if the statute requiring a license to practice medicine applied to the practice of chiropractic, an injunction to restrain the practice of chiropractic without a license would not be granted merely because practicing medicine without a license was made a criminal offense.—Dean v. § 127. —— Use of Buildings and Other Property

Injunction will lie to restrain the unauthorized appropriation or use of public property.

An injunction is a proper remedy to prevent an unauthorized appropriation or use of public property,[54] as for instance an appropriation of public property for private uses,[55] such as the unauthorized erection of a building on public property,[56] or the use of a public building for the conducting of a private business for commercial purposes,[57] especially if the use tends materially to injure the property.[58] On the other hand an injunction will be denied where the use complained of may reasonably be said to come within the contemplated uses for which the building was erected.[59] The public officer or entity concerned is entitled to an injunction to prevent wrongful interference with the proper use of public property.[60]

In general the right to an injunction to prevent the illegal use of public property belongs to the people generally,[61] and a private entity or individual who would not suffer any special injury from such illegal use is not entitled to have such use enjoined.[62]

§ 128. —— Use of Streets and Other Public Places

McAloose, 176 A. 435, 317 Pa. 266.

(2) A school district, prevented from using its school building for school purposes by wrongful prevention of the removal of such building to place designated by district, with result that some two weeks' school was lost before another temporary structure could be put in such place, had right to sue for injunction restraining interference with removal of building, as irreparable damage to, and interference with use of, public property were established.—School Dist. Operating traction engine on street
(1) On an information by the attorney general to restrain a corporation from operating a traction engine and trailers in the streets of a city, it appearing that one street, occasionally used, had never been so constructed as to render it fit for heavy travel, the corporation may be enjoined from using such street without the consent of the city.—McCarter v. Ludlum Steel & Spring Co., supra.

(2) But a borough was not entitled to have the owner of a traction engine enjoined from using the streets of the borough where it appeared that it had become the usual and ordinary custom to make such use of the streets.—Middleburg Borough v. Kratzer, 23 Pa.Dist. 352, 41 Pa.Co. 370, 5 Mun.L.R. 164, 1 Northumb.Leg.J. 408, 28 York Leg.Rec. 135.

Injunction refused
(1) The owner of land adjoining street platted on map could not enjoin erection of buildings on land comprising street, where street had never been graded or used as such and had not been accepted by town

es such as parks.[65] An injunction may be refused where it would produce great public or private mischief and would merely protect technical rights.[66]

In general a private individual is not entitled to an injunction in this type of cases if he does not sustain any special injury from the act of which complaint is made.[67] In any event a private individual is not entitled to an injunction in the absence of a showing of irreparable injury and want of an adequate remedy at law.[68]

§ 129. Publication of Proceedings of Court

In some English cases, noted in 32 C.J. p 286 notes 56–62, injunction has been resorted to by the courts to prevent the publication of their proceedings pending litigation. No American cases on this question have been developed. The publication of reports of judicial decisions or proceedings as constituting a contempt, and punishable as such, is considered in Contempt § 30 d.

G. PERSONAL RIGHTS AND DUTIES

1. In General.

§ 130. Rights Protected in General

An injunction frequently is granted for the protection of purely personal rights where there is no other adequate remedy, although relief ordinarily is granted as to such rights only where the protection of a property right is also involved.

While it is a rule frequently stated that it is beyond the scope of the powers of a court of equity to enforce or protect by way of injunction mere personal rights as distinguished from property rights,[69] there are well recognized exceptions to this rule which are considered infra §§ 131–137, and purely personal rights have frequently been protected allegedly on the basis of invasion of property rights.[70] Further the principle is clearly recognized by some courts that injunctive relief is not limited to the protection of property rights but extends to the protection of personal rights in many fields where no adequate remedy at law is available,[71] and it has been stated that fundamental peror county, and street had been vacated by replatting, and owner had other access to her land which was farm land, the plat of which had been vacated.—Hunt v. Brewer, 91 P.2d 485, 104 Colo. 375.

(2) Where owner denied under oath that improvements were in street and alleged that he had been in quiet and peaceable possession of the premises in controversy for more than twenty years, denial of temporary mandatory injunction to compel owner to move improvements out of street was proper.—City of Beaumont v. Gibbs, Tex.Civ.App., 130 S.W.2d 372.

Personal liberty

"Personal liberty and private property are fundamental rights in this country. The very purpose of law is to protect these rights. Any unlawful interference with them by false statements, acts of coercion, insonal rights are not less sacred and valuable rights or less subject to the protection of a court of equity in a proper case than are property rights.[72] Under a statute which provides for the issuance of an injunction where it shall appear that the person applying for such writ is entitled to the relief demanded and that such relief requires the restraint of some act prejudicial to applicant, the court is entitled to protect personal rights by injunction,[73] and the same is true under a statute providing for injunctive relief to prevent injury "to the plaintiff's rights respecting the subject of the action."[74]

§ 131. Protection from Physical Injury or Insult

Physical injury or insulting conduct cannot be enjoined where there is an adequate remedy at law.

A court of equity has no jurisdiction to prevent mere threatened physical injury, since the remedy at law by an action for damages or a criminal prosecution is adequate;[75] nor has it jurisdiction to enjoin parties from insulting conduct to complainant, as the law provides an adequate remedy and he must resort to it for his protection.[76]

§ 132. Right of Privacy

A right of privacy may be protected by injunction where there is no other adequate remedy or where the remedy is conferred by statute.

The right of personal privacy, where it is recognized under principles discussed in the C.J.S. title Right of Privacy §§ 1–6, also 54 C.J. p 816 note 6–p 822 note 89, may be protected by an injunction if there is no adequate remedy at law[77] or in cases wherein the remedy is specifically given by statute.[78] An injunction cannot issue on this timidation, malice or covert implications that threaten mischief or injury to them may be enjoined."—Paramount Enterprises v. Mitchell, 140 So. 328, 104 Fla. 407.

Unreasonable search and seizure

Injunctive relief from unreasonable searches and seizures was properly granted where searches and seizures were made without probable cause, without personal knowledge on part of searching officer and without any crime or crimes having been committed.—Hague v. Remedy at law inadequate

(1) Where municipal officials constantly disregarded basic civil rights of citizens, the threatened continuance of such tortious acts was sufficient ground for equitable injunctive relief, as against contention that there was full and adequate remedy at law.—Hague v. Committee for Industrial Organization, C.C.A.N.J., 101 F.2d 774, modifying, D.C., Committee for Industrial Organization v. Hague, 25 F.Supp. 127, certiorari granted Hague v. (2) Local law enforcement officers by threatening to continue to arrest, imprison, and prosecute members of Jehovah's Witnesses for selling, circulating, and distributing printed matter under color of Kentucky statutes relating to the offense of sedition, deprive members of rights, privileges, and immunities secured by the federal Constitution, and members were entitled to a permanent injunction restraining officers from continuing such deprivation, since they had no adequate remedy at law.—Beeler v. Smith, D.C.Ky., 40 F.Supp. 139.

§ 134. Libel and Slander

Except as authorized by statute, a court of equity generally has no jurisdiction to enjoin a mere libel or slander where no breach of trust or of a contract is shown.

Remedy by injunction against words is exceptional and is to be reserved for those cases where the exigency is clear.[80] In the absence of statutory authorization,[81] a court of equity has no jurisdiction to restrain a mere libel or slander,[82] where no breach of trust or of a contract is shown,[83] whether the libel is against a public person, private person,

Remedy by criminal prosecution doubtful

An injunction to restrain picketing of dealers who entered into contract for construction of building with knowledge that contractor would not employ union labor could not be refused on ground of adequacy of remedy by criminal prosecution where there was no express malice shown and it was doubtful if law of criminal libel was breached, and hence dealers had no remedy adequate for their grievance as might be afforded by criminal prosecution.—Carter v. Bradshaw, Tex.Civ.App., 138 S.W.2d 187.

Remedy under civil libel statute inadequate

An injunction to restrain picketing of automobile dealers who entered into contract for construction of building with knowledge that contractor would employ nonunion labor could not be refused on ground that dealers had "adequate remedy at law" where their only remedy was under civil libel statute and union members were insolvent and suit for damages would have availed nothing and acts complained of were a violation of personal rights regardless of lack of any visible or measurable damages in dollars and cents.—Carter v. Bradshaw, supra.

or corporation,[84] the remedy being by an action at law for damages or a criminal prosecution.[85] It has been said that the difficulties in the way of affording such relief are insurmountable, growing alike out of constitutional provisions,[86] and want of jurisdiction in the court of equity.[87] The operation of the rule is not affected because of plaintiff's inability to prove special damage,[88] or because a judgment could not be collected against defendant,[89] nor is the rule affected by the fact that the libel or slander was continuous.[90] However, after an action at law in which there is a verdict finding the statements published to be false, plaintiff on a proper showing may have an injunction restraining any further publication of the matter which the jury has found to be acts of libel or slander, and of slanders or libels of a like or similar purport.[91]

Existence of malice in publishing a libel or uttering slanderous words has been held not to make any difference in the jurisdiction of the court;[92] but there is a contrary view.[93]

Relatives of a deceased person may not sue to enjoin a libel of deceased where they do not show any damage to their reputation or property.[94]

§ 135. —— Injury to Business

Subject to some exceptions, the rule according to most authorities is that equity will not exercise its jurisdiction for injunctive relief against a slander or libel where business or property rights are affected thereby, in the absence of acts of conspiracy, intimidation, or coercion, or where no breach of trust or of contract appears.

The authorities are not uniform on the question whether equity will exercise its jurisdiction for injunctive relief against a slander or libel where property rights are affected thereby.[95] According to most authorities, the operation of the rule that equity will not restrain a mere libel or slander is not affected by the fact that the false statement may injure plaintiff in his business, profession, or trade, or as to his credit or property,[96] in the absence of acts of conspiracy, intimidation, or coercion,[97] or where no breach of trust or of contract appears,[98] because the party wronged has an adequate remedy at law[99] by action for damages or criminal prosecution.[1] A fortiori, the court will refuse to enjoin a publication which, although having a tendency to injure complainant's business, is not libel.[2]

According to other authorities exceptions are recognized to the rule that equity will not restrain false statements which may injure plaintiff's business or property,[3] or a different view is held,[4] and under some circumstances, especially in the absence of a complete, practical, and efficient remedy at law, an injunction will issue to restrain false statements which affect plaintiff's business or property.[5]

Equity intervenes in those cases where restraint becomes essential to the preservation of a business or of other property interests threatened with impairment by illegal combinations or by other tortious acts, the publication of the words being merely an instrument and incident,[6] and as otherwise stated, when there is other legitimate ground for equity to issue the injunction, the fact that the publication is also a libel will not prevent the injunction being issued.[7] Accordingly, if the circumstances are such that the publication tends to intimidate and by coercion prevent the public from trading with plaintiff and results in irreparable injury to his property rights, a court of equity may grant relief by injunction.[8]

The successful competitor for the premium offered by an agricultural society for the best machine exhibited cannot by injunction restrain a defeated party from publishing in a newspaper that he, and not complainant, received the premium.[9]

(2) Injunction will not be granted to restrain slander or libel, in absence of infringement of property right.—McFarlan v. Manget, 174 S.E. 712, 179 Ga. 17.

(3) Where there is a continuing cause of unjustified and wrongful attack on a business man motivated by actual malice and causing damage to property rights as distinguished from injury to the personality affecting feelings, sensibility, and honor, equity will take jurisdiction, even though false statements and announcements are the means employed, and conspiracy or unfair competition does not appear, since there is no adequate remedy at law.—Menard v. § 136. —— Slander of Title

In the absence of a breach of trust or of contract, the mere fact that injury may result from the slander of one's title to property does not remove the case from the rule that mere slander or libel will not be enjoined by equity, although some authorities grant the injunction if the false statements were maliciously made.

In the absence of a breach of trust or of contract,[10] the mere fact that an injury may result from a slander of one's title to property does not take the case out of the general rule that mere slander or libel will not be enjoined;[11] plaintiff will be left to his remedy at law.[12] However, in some of the cases a distinction is made between false statements made maliciously, and those made in good faith, and this class of cases holds that the injunction will be granted where malice or a willful purpose to inflict injury is present,[13] but other decisions recognize no such distinction.[14]

An injunction will not be granted to restrain a person from notifying the public that a patent infringement suit has been brought,[15] or that an injunction has been granted to restrain another from using a patent,[16] except where the decree has been obtained by fraud[17] or where such notification misrepresents matters relating to the litigation or decree[18] and is intended to intimidate the trade.[19]

§ 137. Other Rights

The protection of equity has been granted or denied in various miscellaneous cases of personal rights.

As has been noted supra § 130, the protection of equity has frequently been extended to personal rights in many fields in which no adequate remedy at law has been available. These cases more frequently perhaps have arisen with reference to the acts of officers and other governmental agents in the enforcement of a void statute, ordinance, or regulation, and the power of equity to enjoin such acts has been considered supra §§ 108–122.

Political rights. Equity will not abridge political rights by injunction or restrain a citizen from petitioning the legislature or any public body on any subject of legislation in which he is interested,[20] unless his doing so would violate some covenant or agreement with others.[21] Whether injunction will lie to enforce purely political rights is considered supra § 119, and its use with reference to the acts of election officers and the conduct of elections supra § 115.

When obligations of state involved. When the state itself or any of its functions or obligations to the public or to an individual are involved, personal rights may receive protection by injunction.[22] Accordingly, it has been held that the district attorney of a county may maintain a bill for injunction to restrain an "evangelist" engaged in conducting revival meetings from delivering an advertised address purporting to be on the subject of who killed a particular person named where a prisoner indicted for this killing is awaiting trial.[23] Contrary to this view, however, it has been held that a court of equity had no jurisdiction to enjoin the presentation of a play based on the facts of a case established at a preliminary examination and coroner's inquest against defendant then on trial, although it may interfere with the administration of justice and deprive accused of a fair trial.[24]

Marital and domestic rights. In a proper case a court of equity will assume jurisdiction to protect marital rights by injunction.[25] It has been held that a court of equity may extend injunctive relief to prevent an intrusion of a third person into family affairs destructive of the consortium between the spouses;[26] and a spouse may enjoin a third person from alienating the affections of the other spouse,[27] although there is authority to the contrary.[28] It has been held also that, in an action for divorce by a wife, she is not entitled to an injunction pendente lite restraining her husband from cohabiting with another woman, by reason of a statute providing that, where it appears from the complaint that plaintiff demands and is entitled to a judgment against defendant restraining the commission or continuance of an act, the commission or continuance of which, during the pendency of the action, would produce injury to plaintiff, an injunction order may be granted to restrain it, or a statute providing that, where it appears that defendant during the pendency of the action is doing or is about to do some act in violation of plaintiff's rights respecting the subject of the action and tending to render the judgments ineffectual, since the statute gives the remedy by absolute divorce.[29] Various matters relating to domestic relations have been held not the subject of equity protection by way of injunction,[30] such, among others, as the custody of children,[31] and preventing a parent from acting or interesting himself in the marital affairs of his child.[32]

§ 138. In General

a. General rules
b. Industrial disputes

a. General Rules

Acts committed without just cause which interfere with the carrying on of the plaintiff's business and destroy his custom, credit, or profits, to his irreparable injury, may be enjoined if there is no adequate remedy at law.

Since the right to carry on a lawful business without obstruction is a property right,[33] acts committed without just cause or excuse, which interfere with Injunctions in divorce proceedings see Divorce § 103.

Wrong done or threatened

(1) Injunction may lie to restrain husband from contracting marriage after foreign divorce decree not binding on wife, where husband did not pay alimony, since property rights of wife were involved.—Richman v. Richman, 266 N.Y.S. 513, 148 Misc. 387.

(2) Where wife had obtained a judgment declaring husband's matrimonial status and there was no showing of wrong done to the wife or of any wrong threatened, wife was not entitled to enjoin her husband and the woman whom he married from holding themselves out as husband and wife, or to enjoin the other woman from representing herself to be the wife of the husband or from using his surname.—Marquis v. Marquis, 35 N.Y.S.2d 675, 178 Misc. 702.

Defendant's rights not injured

Where plaintiff's physical condition was critical, and he was of a highly nervous and excitable nature, and for a long time objected to his wife keeping company with defendant, her employer, an order restraining defendant from associating with, calling on, or having anything whatever to do with the wife except as related to her duties as employee of defendant deprived defendant of no right to which he was entitled.—Witte v. Bauderer, Tex.Civ.App., 255 S.W. 1016.
